PREFACE.

Now that I am bringing out a sketch of the development of our English tongue during the last 600 years, I must begin by repeating my acknowledgments to the authors I named in my former work on 'Old and Middle English.'

In the Book I now send forth, I have turned to good account the Reprints which we owe to Mr. Arber and the Shakespere Society. I have made much use of Mr. Skeat's Dictionary as regards the origin of our words. I have derived the greatest help from Dr. Murray's Dictionary, so far as it has gone. It will not be completed, I suppose, until twenty years hence; a new edition of my present work, should I live so long, will in that case be a vast improvement upon the edition now given to the public.

I am well aware of the many faults that may be found in my book; men will say that I have left unread what I ought to have read; many a favourite author's name will be suggested, of whom I have taken little notice. I must plead in excuse the fact, that one man cannot read every thing. In my choice of authors, I lean to those that are comic and colloquial, not to the master spirits of our Literature. I take little notice of Spenser and Milton, though I dwell much on the plays left us by Udall and Still.

I start from the time when the germs of New English were springing up within the tract lying between London, Oxford, Shrewsbury, and Boston. I have gone at great length into two particular periods; the last thirty years of the Fourteenth Century, and the twenty years that followed 1520. In this last period flourished Tyndale and Coverdale, the translators of the Bible, the one representing the South, the other the North. After their time, many authors have to be studied, as they lead up to Shakespere, the great point to which all ought to tend. So often have I referred to him, that it would be a mockery to insert every reference to his name in my Index.

I have been careful to set out the many Proverbs to be found in English Literature, and also the various customs of each age. I have thrown light, wherever possible, not only upon the old English pronunciation, but also upon that of France, Germany, and Italy.

As to my Index, I have, as a general rule, confined myself to Teutonic and Celtic words, and also to those Romance words which have some peculiarity. Had I inserted every Romance word I name, I must have brought out a third Volume. I have derived much benefit from criticism on my former works; this has reached me partly in print, partly by letter; I hope for many fresh comments on my 'New English,' and to this end I have given my address.

I have so often laughed at the absurd attempts, much in vogue, to date buildings and writings as early as possible, that I have perhaps fallen into the opposite extreme. Hence I must here withdraw certain remarks of mine on the 'Romaunt of the Rose,' vol. i. pp. 400-402 of my Book. Since I wrote these, Dr. Murray has informed me that without doubt the manuscript of the Romaunt, which is at Glasgow, belongs to the Fifteenth Century. But the very modern forms contained in it, far more modern than those in the works of Blind Harry, are most puzzling. I can only repeat once more that wish of mine, which appears in the note to vol. i. p. 400. The North, in truth, was all along far in advance of the South, as regards the changes of language; and this comes out again two generations later, when we compare Coverdale with Tyndale. The Romaunt of the Rose, I think, is the earliest attempt in English to imitate the Archaic.

I must end by saying that this work on the 'New English' will be of small profit to my readers, unless they first master my book on 'Old and Middle English,' published in 1878.

THE NEW ENGLISH.

CHAPTER I.

I THINK the English tongue, from first to last, may be divided into the ten following parts :—

- (1) 400–950. (Pure English, with hardly any admixture of Danish or Latin.)
- (2) 950–1120. (Much admixture of Danish in the North and East of the Kingdom. Loss of thousands of Old English poetic words.)
- (3) 1120–1220. (Loss of old inflexions, especially in the North and East ; also change in the construction of sentences.)
- (4) 1220–1280. (The most disastrous of all periods. Loss of the power of compounding, and of hundreds of Teutonic prose words ; the upper class discard English for French.)
- (5) 1280–1362. (Translation of French romances and inroad of hundreds of French words to supply the loss of Teutonic words. In 1303 the first well-formed specimen of New English appears.)
- (6) 1362–1474. (A new Standard of English, much akin to the model of 1303, is spoken at Court. It is, as yet, militant, since many dialects are spoken in the different shires.)

- (7) 1474–1586. (The new Standard is triumphant in all the shires south of Trent. The Printing press and the Reformation seem to fix the language.)
- (8) 1586–1660. (The Golden Age of English literature; prose becomes much more involved.)
- (9) 1660–1750. (The Age of the great Satirists; a plainer style in prose prevails.)
- (10) 1750–1886. (Dr. Johnson infects English prose, and his evil influence is lasting. The Good style of the former period, and the Bad later style, or Johnsonese, are alike seen in our day.)

In my former work, I stopped at 1310, to include that great landmark, Robert of Brunne's early writings. I now call attention to certain other works of this period—works in which the English is not so well formed as it was in the neighbourhood of Rutland. Salop will be very prominent in this chapter; here Northern and Southern English seem to meet. The number of new French words is always increasing, and the Teutonic element is very slowly diminishing. From 1290 to 1350 the proportion of Teutonic nouns, verbs, and adverbs that are now obsolete is 3 out of 50; from 1350 to 1400 this proportion becomes 2 out of 50; from 1400 to 1450 it becomes 1 out of 50; after the last-named year it is hardly worth while counting. In these calculations we must always set aside Alliterative poems.

I first cast a glance at the English pieces between 1303 and 1320. Two of these, assigned to Friar Michael of Kildare, are printed in Mr. Furnivall's 'Philological Society' publication, p. 152; these give us some idea of the dialect of the Irish Pale soon after 1300. The old pava had appeared as pecock in the Alexander; it is here written poucok, p. 153; a curious instance of ð, when coupled with w, being corrupted into ou. The noun brewester appears, which now survives only as a proper name; we hear of the coking-stole. In p. 156 stands makith glad (merry); here the pronoun you is dropped after the verb. In p. 153 stands the new phrase soch an opir, referring to a previous noun. There is put it in writte (writing), p. 154; we have also the phrase drink dep, p. 156, and the verb bouse (booze), p. 154. We see to supplant the old op, in wading up to þe chynne, p. 161. There is the Scandinavian noun slete, p. 157. The French words are ditee (ditty), draperie, avoir-de-peise, pinch, pillori, poding, sioun (scion), randun (random), consonant, vowel. Birds are cooked in stu, p. 159; here the French estuve is clipped; we see the connexion between stove and stew.

In a piece printed in the 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' ii. 177, the verb cast is employed for prædestinare; hence our forecast. There is also lollai, addressed to a babe, whence comes lullaby. There is a poem by Michael of Kildare, in the same book, ii. 190; here we see the noun thin oute going, replacing the old utgang.

In ii. 119 comes another poem of this time; here we see the sound ou replacing l, for fewté stands for fealty, p. 120; thus the French turned col into cou. There had been an Old English word hafenleas (inops), pointing to some such word as hafen (victus)—this is slightly changed in p. 119; povere is myn having; havour was to come later. We see the phrase good felawe in p. 121, here meaning simply that Christ made Himself our equal. Something is kept under a lok, p. 121, a new use of the preposition. There is in hap (fortasse), p. 121, the source of Lydgate's perhaps. The interjection ho! appears in p. 120, meaning satis; to cry ho! was embodied in the English Bible by Coverdale long afterwards; hence our carter's wo-ho! We see the French word riflour (robber). In p. 121 Cristendom stands, not as formerly for Christian faith, but for all Christian kingdoms.

There is a long list of English words, with their French equivalents, dating from this time; they are printed in 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' ii. 78. The ow is clipped, for ancleow becomes ankel (ankle), a Scandinavian form of the word. The o replaces u, for we see bolting-cloth: it replaces a, as gode (goad). The old dæges eage is pared down to dayseie. The former lawerce now becomes larke; in Scotland it became lauerc, laverc, laveroc. The Old English cerlice (charlock) is here written szerlok, showing how the proper name Sherlock arose. The greatest change is navegar into nauger, afterwards to become auger; here the v was mistaken for u. The d is added, for the old fealefor is seen as feldefare (fieldfare). The former dweorg appears as dweruf (dwarf), the f replacing g. The es is added to the old poc, and pokes (= veroles) appears.

Among the new substantives are woddekoc, mahssing-fate (mash-tub). We see pinnes named as part of a cart's gear.

There is the new verb quek (of a duck).

The words akin to the Dutch and German are heckle (a word well known in Scotch politics), and sis, which here replaces the old hiss.

The Scandinavian words are flake, to slaver, splinter, kidnei, and be-litter (the French enfaunter). Here belongs the first syllable of titemose, which is also found; we see the noun lane with its French translation venel—the latter word is still used in Scotch towns.

The French words at this time adopted into England, are core, criket, gules, flute, chiri (cherry). There is annnd hirnes, p. 84, our andirons; the French andier simulating a Teutonic ending. In the same page the French purceus appears in English as porceaus (porkers). Our English knel in p. 79 is translated by the French apel, showing whence comes a peal of bells. The word raton appears instead of the old rat; hence Dandie Dinmont talks of rottons. Our garters, written garthors in p. 79, are derived from the Picard gartier rather than from the literary French jarretier.

English was now coming once more into use, when contracts were to be put in writing. There are the statutes of two Norwich Gilds, drawn up in 1307 (Early English Text Society), where we see pe dede used as in the Handlyng Synne, without the word man following. The word gilde is employed in the two senses, payment and brotherhood, p. 122. There is the phrase go to law; and the foreign words dirige (dirge), p. 20, messe of requiem, letterede (learned). We see the phrase, to refuse office, p. 21.

In the Religious and Love Poems (Early English Text Society), p. 221, there is a piece written about this time, and transcribed fourscore years later. We here have both the forms rotelen and ratelen (rattle) applied to the throat and the teeth. There is nouth longe gon (not long ago); Shoreham has almost the same phrase.

There are some poems, mostly Southern, ranging between 1302 and 1311, in the Political Songs printed by the Camden Society. King Edward I. is highly praised, and appears as "he with the longe shonkes," p. 223. The e replaces ui, as gerland (garland) for the French guirlande. The i or y replaces e and æ, as in clink and typeth (tippet). The u replaces o, as in purpos, the French propos. We see the proper name Hobbe, not the Hobekin of Gloucestershire; we read of Cheepe, the great London thoroughfare, p. 221. There are the new nouns pitfall and clasp. The custom, imitated from France, is seen of placing the before a surname, as The Bruytz (Bruce). Many new adjectives are here formed by adding less to a noun, as nameless, ruthless, pennyless. This revived fashion was now coming in.

Among the verbs we remark the expletive, so mote ich the! (so may I thrive) which lasted down to 1550. In p. 222 a person laketh a day—that is, says alack a day! the word alack is not found by itself until near 1450. In p. 219 a wager is y-bate, perhaps the first use of the verb bet, which did not reappear for ages. In p. 187 Frenchmen beaten in war are said to be bought and sold; a phrase applied afterwards to Richard III. The verb clap gets the new meaning pulsare—heads are clapped off; hence our "clap on the back." There is the verb hoder (our huddle), akin to the German; also the Scandinavian filch.

The English ballad-maker shows sound Teutonic patriotism when he chuckles over the Flemish victory over the common enemy at Paris; still he sprinkles his poem with long French phrases. He has a pun on the word coning, the name of the Flemish leader, connecting it with the French word for rabbit, our cony. He talks of the com- mune, an awful word in France in 1871. The French form hastifliche is preferred to the Teutonic hastiliche. The verb charge gets Joinville's new sense of jubere. There is the noun hot, our hut. In the French poem (p. 293) we see the word rascaylle (common soldiers), which was to bear a far baser meaning in England 250 years later.

There is a Southern piece, compiled about this time, called 'King Solomon's Book of Wisdom,' printed along with Adam Davy's poems (Early English Text Society). Here we see newfangel, p. 83, a word afterwards used by Chaucer. The preposition for is employed to denote change; bileve olde for newe, p. 83. The word salary appears in the same page.

In the specimens of Lyric Poetry (Percy Society) are some that seem to date from about the year 1310, as we see by the great proportion of French words. The form morewening (morning), p. 60, was peculiar at this time to the south and west of England; and the unusual nam (ivit), p. 96, points to a Southern shire near the place where the 'King Horn' was compiled. The unto (usque ad) was a thoroughly Northern form; and here we see the old in to, p. 89. The French words are gingivre, incens, piete (not pity), also the verb counseil, p. 95.

There are the statutes of a Lynne Guild, drawn up in 1316 (English Gilds, Early English Text Society). Among the new French words are deen (dean), attourne (attorney), galoun, fawty, an obit, excusacioun.

William de Shoreham (Percy Society), a Kentish religious poet, wrote about 1320. He has the form ia for ea as in the Kentish treatise of 1290; thus diath appears. He supplants the single e by a, as in harkne (hearken). He uses e like the Salopians, where Northern England employed i, and Southern England u; as in senne (sin), prede (pride), mery, and other words; medden (meddle), is used for the Icelandic míðla. In fri and nides, i replaces e, and foreshadows our present pronunciation. In ele (oleum) and anelien, the Old English form is preferred to the more usual French oile; but the latter is also used by the poet. The former manhâd now becomes manhod; with us the Southern hood at the end of a word has almost always ousted the Northern head. The ou supplants o in foul (fool), goud, roude, just as we now pronounce these words. The anui of the 'Ancrēn Riwle' is written anoye, p. 36. The old raw (series) is found both as rowe and rewe, just as the two sounds Douk and Dewk (dux) long ran on side by side. The ydropsi of the 'Cursor Mundi' is now pared down to dropesy, p. 113. The b is struck out, for climme stands for the old climbe, p. 3. When we see manyour (manger), p. 122, we have a most curious instance of y supplanting the soft g. The old bruchel (fragilis) is supplanted by brotel, our brittle. The verb bensy (p. 50) for benedicere is a remarkable English contraction. The banns of marriage appear in p. 71, where they are yged (cried); also gossibrede, p. 68, so well known in the Irish statute-book. The noun bleddre is used in p. 2, where we should now put blunder. The vocative, man, is often used throughout the poem, addressed to the reader. There are new verbs like bishop, bewitch, bistow (collocare), bytreuth (betroth), come about (evenire), draz into mende (call to mind). These are the new phrases go a pylgrymage, tyde what bytyde, p. 107; here the verb is repeated, and the what stands for whatsoever; this led to Chaucer's be as be may. In the phrase wytnesse Cryst, p. 74, be (sit) is dropped. In p. 64 a particular betrothal will not healde (hold); here the verb is used intransitively. In p. 99 a man may commit theft by wordes that he craketh—that is, falsely utters—a new sense of the verb; our schoolboys still speak of mendacium as a cracker. The clap (pulsare) takes the new sense of loqui, p. 135; clack was to come later. The past participle ago, first found in Dorset in 1240, is now applied to time, where a Northern man would have used sin; nauzt fern ago, "not far ago," p. 103. The word nothing is used for the old nought (not): something is nothyngge loude, p. 33; hence the later nothing loth. The French bien seems to have led to the new address, Wel, brother, p. 11. There is a new use of it in p. 16, hou is hit (that) there bethe so fele? here, moreover, we see the close connexion between how and why; they are both instrumental cases of who. The of is now used after verbs of sense, as in the 'Cursor Mundi;' a word smaketh of God, p. 48. In p. 109 Satan is called myx (stercus) of alle myxe; this foreshadows our "heart of hearts," and is a continuation of the "right he loved of all things," to be found in the 'Havelok.' There is the new phrase in tokne that. The attempt at translating the French que, seen in the 'Cursor Mundi,' is repeated; wat the was wo! p. 88; in p. 125 there is another rendering of the que, O that hy were blythe! (O how blithe they were!)

It is curious to remark how early Northern phrases found their way into the South, a process that never ceased. We see, in this Kentish writer, Orrmin's Weak Perfect wepte, and the very Scandinavian whatsomevere. The Northern bard's dwell has travelled down into Kent, and seems to mean habitare, not morari, in p. 19. There is the verb i-lykned (similatus) akin to the German; and our waver, the Icelandic vafra, is seen in p. 16. By the side of these new words stands such a form as prophetene, p. 92, showing how the old Genitive Plural, long dropped in the North, lingered on in Kent; where also eadie (beatus) clings to life, before altogether disappearing.

The new French words are many. The old reguerdon takes its English form reward, p. 97. Shoreham prefers the form crouche (hence, Crouchback, a crusader) to the other forms of cruc-em, croice or cross. The new chalice supplants the caliz of the 'Ancren Riwle;' and corps replaces cors. Instead of stint of, we find cesse of, followed by a noun, p. 96, whence comes leave off. The word after had hitherto expressed secundum as well as post; but Shoreham brings in the form acordawnt to, p. 89, which is now most common with us; here a French phrase is used to lessen the weight formerly thrown upon one English preposition; this process has been since carried far. In mercy and misericorde, p. 43, the learned author shows that he can bring in Latin forms as well as French. In p. 56 a mass priest is called a mynystre; this word was very long in rooting itself in England. In p. 96 we hear of an auditour of accounts. There is the new phrase here aryst (arose) ques- tion, p. 166. The French form contrait, not contract, appears; and also eue, showing how eau was once sounded in France. I have already remarked upon Bewly or Beaulieu Abbey. The former eisil is now replaced by fynēgre, our vinegar; here one French word supplanted another. The word soverayn, which we were to make so much use of, appears to have been employed in Kent alone at this time; it is also found in the 'Ayenbite of Inwyt,' twenty years later. We now see admynystracioun, array, to stanch, caracter, cantle, myrour, oryginal, grain, chisel; the adjective sodein is made an adverb by attaching the Teutonic liche to it. There is ententiflyche and also the verb atende to, two different forms. A man is concluded in a dispute, p. 106; hence our slang shut up; he no longer rues a sin, but repents of it, p. 154. All these French forms show us how the clergy at this time, like the two other learned professions, loved to wrap up their mysteries in a tongue far removed from vulgar ken. We feel the disastrous effects of the policy of Manning, Shoreham, Hampole, and their fellows, to this day.

There is a well-known poem, of some length, compiled about 1321, on the miseries of England under Edward II. (Political Songs, Camden Society). It seems to be due to a Salopian bard: we see the Active participle in ende; there is uch (quisque), which was long one of the marks of this shire; there are both the Northern thei and the Southern thilk; and Orrmin's peculiar overgart, which, moreover, occurs in another Salopian piece. There is a curious passage in p. 336; we hear that if the king sends for nine or ten recruits from some town, "the stiffest" (strongest) are allowed to remain at home on paying ten or twelve shillings, while helpless wretches are enlisted, the counterparts to "most forcible Feeble."

The a replaces e, as parson (a true Salopian form), not persone, p. 326; and a distinction seems to be drawn between him and the priest. The old mor (palus) is now written mure, our moor. The French bussel is altered into our bussel. There are the new substantives *daffe*¹ (stultus) formed from gedæfte (humilis); sheepish and simple have undergone the like degradation. Meanwhile dæfte (conueniens) survives in deft, with a meaning most opposite to the Scotch daft. We hear of the heie wey, and Godes man, (a man of God). Men murder each other: wid wille, p. 343; hence our "do it with a will." The word girles, p. 337, means children both male and female. There is the new adjective unwelcome; shrewed has from a Past Participle become an adjective; whence the adverb shrewedlich (malè) is formed in p. 326.

The old indefinite man was now dying out, and a substitute had to be found; so we see theih wolen bigile the (te), p. 339, where the last word stands for all mankind. A bragging squire is said in p. 336 to make it stout—that is, to lord it; this is a new use of the it which was to be much developed sixty years later.

We see the verb wagge used both transitively and intransitively in pp. 332 and 333. A man piketh up food, in p. 334; there are phrases like wel farende (faring) folk (pinguis); hu the silver goth (runs away). The up to down of Gloucester now becomes up-so-down, p. 335, whence came upside down 200 years later. There is a new use of at; wheat is at foure shillinges, p. 341; here some verb like priced must be dropped.

The Scandinavian words are deie (ancilla, whence came dairy), bote (ocrea), derpe (caritas).

The French words are taxacion, quarter (of wheat), soup, furred, to institute. In p. 327 we read of a woman kacching a mate; a kind of sporting not obsolete in our day. A priest serves a chapel, p. 327; men are served (treated) in a particular way, p. 330. We see in p. 336 the origin of "the cut of his clothes;" we there read of "a newe taille (fashion) of squierie;" this last word stands for squire's state. In the same page nurture represents our "good breeding," a sense of the word that lasted long. One stanza is directed against barristers, "countours that stondesth at the barre;" another against attorneys, p. 339. In p. 344 assisours are denounced, who come to shire and hundred (the courts so named), and take bribes; these men are needy, and a distinction is drawn between them and the rich Justice. One of the most remarkable things in this piece is the Romance preposition de set before a Teutonic verb; deskatered stands in p. 337; it may be that the de was mistaken for Teutonic to (dis).

In 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' i. 266, we see the phrase casten drynke; hence comes "cast a shoe." In p. 291 there is an amusing piece on music lessons, probably East Anglian; here we find the old geac (simpleton) replaced by goke, whence comes gawky. Some notes of music are compared to a fleshoke; we compare writing to pothooks. There is the technical phrase, to hold a note in riht ton; afterwards comes, to tuch a note. We hear of the Cesolfa (si, sol, fa). The verb look adds the sense of videri to that of videre; I loke as a lurdeyn, p. 291.

There are some other pieces of this time in 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' ii. 19, 225, and 241. We have already seen Tuesday written for Teusday in Gloucestershire; we now find boe and floe written for beo and fleo; the uche (quisque) replaces ech, much as clupe and bulies had already replaced clepe and baelg in the Severn country. There is the new phrase play a game, p. 241; and the new verb bill, applied to a bird, p. 20. The old soru gives birth to a new noun soroufolnesse, p. 226. There is abakward, p. 228, which was soon to have its first syllable clipped. There is a new use of the preposition for in p. 19; "Christ save her, for the fairest may that I ever met!" here in former times some such phrase as since I hold her must have come before the for; it is equivalent to as being. There is the verb lash, which is akin to the German; a man lashes out Latin, p. 242; we talk of a horse lashing out. There is the Celtic riban (ribbon). The new French words are sing by rote, rave, enke orn (inkhorn); here enke replaces the French encre. In another piece of this time, 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' i. 168, we find fesant henne and fesant cocke, a new way of distinguishing genders. The keping of a forest is given to a man, and his dogs are specified.

The 'Metrical Homilies,' printed by Mr. Small, seem to have been compiled in the North about 1320. They have much in common with the 'Cursor Mundi;' there are phrases like overman, squeal, lass, the adverb fair, wherefore and why, hou wil (shall) we com, and many other tokens of the North; the phrase qua was wraathe but he? reminds us of the Tristrem. We find an usage, often repeated by Chaucer; that of making a rime of two words, spelt in the same way, if they express different ideas; thus, in p. 131, Elisha addresses Gehazi—

"Forthi that Godd Naaman helid (sanavit), Toc thou gift, and sithen it helid (celavisti)."

There is a proverb in p. 167—

"Bot qua sa leses fra hinging
Ther, or bringes up funding (foundling),
Of nauther getes he mense ne mede."

The i or y is clipped at the end of a word; we find viker (vicar), and Anton; the Scandinavian ras (cursus) is preferred to the Old English ræs. The old deye (mori) is now altered into dye. The hard k of the North replaces the French ch in kemes (a shift), a word that had long been naturalised in England. The ness is added to an adjective, as ugliness. We have seen kin and kyth in the 'Cursor Mundi,' where the last word may still mean patria, as of old; the two nouns seem to have been so coupled together, that they were mistaken for synonyms; in p. 108 Christ is lost on the road by His parents, who search for Him imang thair kith; Lady Nairne has the same mistake in her poems; may we meet neighbours, kith and kin! In p. 139 we see the word corsing, which here means usury; later, it might mean trading; Scott calls Blount "a sworn horse-corser." In p. 55 St. James speaks of a pilgrim to Compostella as "his man;" the town is called Sain Jamis, in the Genitive, no noun following; this way of dealing with proper names is something new. We see the nedes of his house in p. 80; this is the first appearance of the Plural of need. There is the noun inlate (inlet). The Present participle of cunnan (scire) is made an adjective in p. 93; this cunnand became cunning thirty years later.

As to pronouns, the Reflexive Dative, himm ane (solus), had been used by Orrmin ; this is altered, the construction being mistaken, into the genitive hys ane, p. 69 ; whence comes the Scotch corruption, his lane, her lane.

In p. 107 the Virgin holds (keeps) house in Nazareth.

There is the new phrase how that, following a verb, where the that is not wanted ; the same change took place in German.

There is the Scandinavian verb mistake.

The French words are lurdan, surpris, miscarry, dongoun (carcer). Christ, we are told in p. 66, was born in a poor pentiz ; this word, two centuries later, was turned into pent house. There is the new phrase, "to be delivered of her child," p. 63.

There is a poem on the Assumption, dating from about 1320, contained in the 'King Horn' (Early English Text Society), p. 75. We here see by and by, meaning statim, p. 85, its sense for the next 200 years. There is the curious evelté more than once, p. 87 ; a Romance ending is once more tacked on to a Teutonic root.

The Gottingen version of the 'Cursor Mundi' may have been drawn up about 1320 ; the transcriber, who has added a little to his original, gives us his name, p. 979.

"Speciali for me 3e pray
pat pis bock gart dight, John of Lindbergh, I 3u sai
pat es mi name ful right."

He was a Northern man, and he keeps many old words that had to be altered by the later Lancashire and Southern transcribers. Sometimes he adopts a Southern form, as when he exchanges thepen for pennis (thence), p. 17.

Sometimes the sense of a passage is mistaken altogether, as in line 4288. There is the phrase "evil pack," p. 135, where the word adds the meaning of turba to its old sense of sarcina. There is justify in the Scotch sense (do justice), p. 17. The form dais of the older text is here altered into the brand-new former dais, p. 527. The verb allow may now take a dative; the old alou mi wil (praise my will), p. 1146, now becomes alou me mi wil (give me credit for my will), marking a change in the meaning of the French verb.

In the Statutes of the Lynne Guild of 1329 (Early English Text Society), we see make god (good) his entrees, p. 63; also the preposition by used as an agent, for the first time I think, since the 'Blickling Homilies;' this was soon to be repeated in the 'Ayenbite;' provyd be men, p. 63. There are also the new words sufficient and profethabil.

I take from Dr. Murray's dictionary two phrases dating from this time, "aleft he smot and aright;" our right and left. The old genitive alra (omnium) was now so little understood that we find "the althrest fairest sete."

The Auchinleck poems (Weber's 'Metrical Romances') seem to have been compiled about 1330, most likely in Salop. We find the fer (ignis) of that shire, and there is a mixture of Southern and Northern forms. In the 'Amis and Amiloun' (ii. 369) stands chepeing town, p. 440; which shows how Chipping Norton got its name; Orrmin, much earlier, had used chepeing before another noun. English was now trying to express foreign titles; in p. 420 stands Mi lord the Douke. There is the alliterative wele and wo. Schulder-blade is first found in p. 426, and brotherhed comes in p. 384; the latter means brotherly love; in earlier times it had meant a gild.

Among the adjectives stands the comparative frendeleser; as strange a form as the sorfuller of the 'Cursor Mundi.'

Layamon's hal and hæil is changed in p. 462; hayl and hole (sanus et integer). In p. 416 stands we be liche; here "one to another" is omitted. In p. 468 we see faire ded (fairly dead); here our word for pulchrè slides into the sense of omnino; fair had been used for satis in 1220.

As to verbs, in p. 459 stands wo-bigon; the last part of the word being the Past Participle of the old begangan (circumdare). There is the phrase bid (beg) our bread.

The preposition about is here turned into an adverb, as we saw in Shoreham; Amoraunt bar his lord about, p. 446. The alas, for shame of the 'Cursor Mundi' (where the for translates ob) now becomes simply for shame, p. 420.

This piece being probably a Salopian poem, we are not surprised at meeting a new Celtic verb, pour, which first appears here. The French words are habergeon, noricerie (nursery), stay (manere). The verb aprove (testari) is in p. 402, and shows us the origin of our legal word approver.

The Lay Le Freine, one of the Auchinleck Romances, is in Weber, i. 358. The ge is pared away; for getwin becomes tuin (geminus). There are the phrases gret with childe, all the winter-long night, p. 362; (life-long was to come later). The adjective melche is formed from milk, p. 364; hence a milch cow. There is take mi chaunce; come is followed by an Infinitive, p. 367, when y com to have it.

To the county of Salop the 'Romance of the Seven Sages' (Weber, iii.) seems to belong; though the first five pages and the last forty-five have been taken from another version of the poem,—a Northern one. There are the new Salopian terms, sweting and upsodown; also the Salopian e for i or u, as kess, pelt, geltif; there is the Midland active participle in end; niman is used for the Latin ire, as in the West Midland. There are the Northern sket and the Southern thilk, the Northern must and the Southern mot (oportet), tokens of the Great Sundering Line. The o becomes ou, for the old rop (clamor) appears as roupe, p. 47, a word still in Scotch use. The s is added to a word; as Gemes, our James, for the former Jame. The ch replaces k, when we find skriche (screech) for the old skrika; we still keep both screech and shriek. The n is docked, for we find chike, not chicken, p. 84. The n is preserved in the Salopian graunt-mercys, p. 38; but it is struck out in the Northern gramercy, p. 130.

There are the new substantives barli water, dunghill, sea-side; there is the new gade, applied to an unwise woman in p. 102; whence perhaps our jade. The adverb is placed before the noun, for the sake of brevity; as, thi to-nightes meting (dream), p. 93. The substantive qualifies the adjective, as, stanestill, p. 141. A substantive replaces a verb, as, my wil es to dine, p. 146; also, thai war in will to solas tham, p. 135.

Among the adjectives we find blind so ston (stone-blind); there is free stone, p. 118; one of the oldest senses of free was lordly; free mason was yet to come. The word good is used in a new sense in p. 87; thou comest hither for no gode. The old comparative eldre or uldre is now changed into alder, our older, p. 143.

Among the verbs we remark a new construction of shall: it replaces the old is to, with the Infinitive; thy loverd schal make a fest, p. 72 (purposes to do it). The old mun can still express the future, and not necessity; see p. 110. The Auxiliary verb may now stand by itself without any infinitive following; a man is bidden to avenge his son; he answers, so ich schal, p. 106. This so is equivalent to that (id ipsum). We have seen the curious Old English construction with should, where should come stands for our came; this is now transferred to Interrogative sentences; who schulde beget him but the king? in answer to a question as to paternity, p. 42. There is a strange repetition in p. 119; "into the toure the knight gan gane" (did go). There are phrases like make redy, make meri, make a bed, make moche to done (ado), p. 73; go about to do it, hold thy peace, is it comen therto? (to this point), p. 47. The Intransitive bleed takes an accusative; blede thre disch-fol (dishfuls), p. 75. The welcome is now followed by an Infinitive; thai war welkum to sojorn, etc., p. 146. The Scandinavian verb witnen makes way for the new witness (testari), p. 28. The verb bob (ferire) gets the new sense of decipere, p. 87; Iago bobs jewels from his dupe much later. In p. 103 we have "pluk up thin herte." The Old and New constructions often stand close together; in p. 114 we have the old form, him dremyd of it; in p. 113 stands, the lady dremyd an thoght, etc. In the Northern version, p. 109, there is a peculiar use of hope for putare; sum hoped he war the fend of hell; so we often now use I expect for puto.

Among the adverbs are how so? what then? thereat. The stille (adhuc) in p. 60 was as yet peculiar to the North of England. The hwile in p. 64 is used in the Northern sense of usque ad. To balance this, in the very next page there is a Salopian use of til for the Latin dum; "I shall never see thee til I live;" this is repeated in Piers Ploughman, and in the poem on Freemasonry.

The preposition to now follows do; treachery is i-don to a bird in p. 89.

There is the verb flap, akin to a Dutch word; and the Scandinavian forcrasen (frangere), p. 30, whence comes crazy. There is also the Scandinavian crake (cornix) which survives in corn-crake.

Among the French words are gardin, corfu (curfew), saucer, quest (inquest), female. There are the Interjections haro! and fi, fi! p. 63; the old datheit appears for almost the last time in p. 93; there is the courtly sauve your grace! used to an Emperor, p. 28. The word mater is used for importance; a thing of gret mater, p. 77. The word sure appears in make them seur of, p. 79. We find beves flesch, p. 44; the former word is preserved in our Bibles. A Teutonic and a Romance word are coupled in eld age (senectus), p. 22. A Teutonic word takes a Romance ending, as geltif (guilty), p. 34; we have already seen bond-age. There is a curious French idiom in p. 27, that he war an-honge (let him be hanged); our fathers always found the que too much for them. Another French idiom is imitated in p. 21; a command is given, and the one word blethliche (volontiers) is answered. A knight asks a lady what chere she made, p. 121; see also p. 149; both of these passages occur in the Northern version of the poem, and refer to the mind, not to the body. The word boie in p. 39 means carnifex, not puer; it had already occurred in the 'Havelok.'¹ We see the Teutonic boi (puer) in p. 53.

I have already remarked on one and the same word being used as a rime, if it expresses two different meanings; in p. 47 we have

" Dame, he saide, pluk up thi cher,
Other tel me whi thou makest swich cher."

Here the first cher means "courage;" the second means "sad countenance."

Other poems of the Auchinleck manuscript may be read in Horstmann's 'Altenglische Legenden,' pp. lvii. and 242. The French herber becomes erber, our arbour, p. lvii. There is the new phrase mani a moder child, p. 253; whence comes "every mother's son." There is the very old form alp (elephas), p. 248. A body is beaten blo and blac, p. 248; in the next Century this was to become blak and blew. There is a new use of manner; a man does things on (in) his best maner, p. 246; hence a painter's earliest manner. There is the Adjective joiles (joyless); also lorer tre (laurus). In a rather later copy of an Auchinleck legend, on and on is altered into on be on (one by one), p. 246; row by row had appeared about 1200. Some other poems in this Volume seem to belong to 1330; we see the compound longe tayled, p. 332; there is the form pou doyst (not dost or dest), p. 333. The verb cluter is used of a friar preaching, p. 503.

Robert Manning of Brunne, author of the 'Handlyng Synne,' translated a French historical poem into English after 1337; see p. 243.² The unusual word aglifte (territus) is common to the two pieces written by him; also aim, plank, to-name, niman (ire), manly (fortiter); the former interjection prut now becomes trut! p. 317, perhaps the parent of our tut! He appears more Northern in his dialect than he was before, since the present poem has been altered by no Southern transcriber. He uses ilk, not eche, and the Active participle in and. There are the Northern phrases unto, time and tide; the Godes man of the 'Cursor Mundi' here becomes man of God.

He changes the French ou into e, as contreve for contrower, our contrive; the form preve was later very near supplanting pruve, prove; we have already seen gle stand for gleow. The word eage (oculus) now becomes ize. What was written mure in 1307 appears here as mire, taking the new meaning of lutum, p. 70; the old fenn had expressed both lutum and palus. The new blo had already stood for the Teutonic blâ (lividus); it now stands for the French bloie (cæruleus), p. 173; it may represent the Old English bleo (cæruleus). The French Jeanne appears as Jone, our Joan; Jane was to come later. The g is turned into w—the Celtic Macdougall became Macdowall in Galloway; moreover the French regarder appears as reward, p. 294; but this last was to be soon confined to reguerdon. The t in the middle is struck out; we see vanward, whence comes our vanguard. The þ undergoes the same lot; Superei becomes Surray, p. 15. This þ is turned into t, as sleihte for the old slehþe (astutia). The n is clipped; for on flote becomes o flote, our afloat. The final n is clipped; the Past Participle risen becomes rise, whence comes "his anger is riz." The r is struck out; the tristre (statio) of 1220 is seen as triste. The French ss is changed into sch, at the end of a word, as warnische (garnish).

Among the Substantives we find his side (party), my heved (overlord), p. 90, seen also as chefe, p. 237; peel (castellum); castles are won, ilka stik, every stick, p. 113. The name Jack appears, coming from Jon, Jan, Jankin, Jakkin; it has nothing to do with the French Jacques; there is, moreover, Hugh, not the Huwe of the 'Havelok'; also the Welshery. The word bank is used of earthworks in besieging a town. We have already seen go his gate, we now find go thy ways; the use of the Plural is curious. The word sand (arena) is here used in the Plural, and evese takes the awkward Plural eveses (eaves). The old quiste of the 'Havelok' is confused with the verb bicwepen; bequest is the result. The word holde takes a new meaning besides that of castellum; we see to have a hold (power of seizing). The old fee (pecunia) gets the sense of premium. The word bond now means fœdus as well as vinculum. The old breze (supercilium) is now used for the top of a hill; Manning talks of bank ne brê; brae is a famous word in Scotland. The old blade (folium) gets another meaning, that of lamina. The word foot is now applied to measures; a fote of land, p. 140. The word tide (tempus) expresses æstus for the first time, I think, in p. 164; to take the tide, where the sea is in question. There are the feudal words ward and relefe, p. 214. The word clipper is used in respect of coinage, p. 238. In p. 294 a provost is called a cherle; this word, in Lincolnshire as well as in Kent, was becoming a term of reproach, as had happened long before to its synonym villein. The word town is added to a proper name, as in the 'Handlyng Synne;' Acres town, p. 143.

There is the phrase, bare as Job, p. 323; also soþ (true) as þe gospelle, p. 123.

There is the term no body, I think for the first time. Among the Verbs we see the promise, to live and die with a man, p. 45; a phrase that was to be common till 1700; the sweltan of the 'Chronicle' had here vanished. We hear in p. 46 that men were smyten into elde (grew old); here, I suspect, is the source of the later stricken in years. In p. 58 stands take the lawe (appeal to, occupy); the of was to be added later to this phrase. In p. 70 men upsette saile (erigunt); we should now dock the up; the Scotch still talk of the upset price of a thing; the sense now usually borne by this word in Southern parts suggests down, not up. In p. 170 one ship overreaches another—that is, "overtakes." In p. 205 men let flie a quarelle (bolt). In p. 222 comes to say longly or schorte; hence our, "the long and short of it is." In p. 191 stands it salle be þam hard, bot, etc.; we should say, "it shall go hard, but," etc.; this usage of but as quin had come in about 1300. A man is stokked (set in the stocks), p. 121, the first reference to this punishment. We see do his bidding, cast lots, keep the sea, I say myn avis (mind), breke prison, I shrew you, do his devere, raise a tax, make all right, bear him down, hold his awen (own), in battle; lose his travail (labour); we say here "take trouble for nothing." We have already seen take flight; a man now takes (resorts to) the mountain; take the field was to come a few years later. The word carve is now applied to cunning workmanship, when the brother of Robert Bruce is mentioned. There are the new Verbs rank (rankle), overrun. There is the phrase or (ere) come a week; this is the source of our "a month, come Christmas," where ere must be dropped; this is a phrase of the next Century.

There are the Adverbial phrases, backward; when he was overe (across the stream), p. 219. The old buton, and the later but if þat, coming after a Negative, make way for but that; none shall say, bot þat ze be boun, ii. 291.

As to Prepositions we find, at the first, prove it on him, behind thy back, through (by) dint of; the over is prefixed to Romance words, as over-prest (ready).

The words akin to the Dutch and German are cogge (scapha; hence our cock-boat); swalz (vorago), whence the swallows of the Mole river; doude (dowdy), sidling (our sidelong), mud (coupled with mire), to stake (palare), to ame (aim).

The Scandinavian words are windas (windlass), scop (scoop), soppe, bouspret, bouline. The Icelandic bógr bears the sense of cortina proræ, a meaning wanting to the English bóg or bôh. There is "a trip of gile," p. 156; whence came "to trip him." There is the Celtic podel (puddle).

The French words are quash, enbusche (ambush), riff and raff, date (tempus), voide, duchy, rince, deses (mors), larder, extent, repent it, vencuse (vanquish), bayard (of a horse), besquite (biscuit), austere, somons (summons), to convei, navy, mastif, dowerie, commonwele, commons, rascaile of refuse (applied to the Scots), rok (the chess-piece), penne, man of arms. The old French sirurgien is cut down to surgien; there is also serch (petere); this form, and not chercher, still prevails in the middle and south of France. To depart, in the sense of separare, now becomes part.

The Picard cauchie (chaussée) is found here as kaucé, afterwards, from a false analogy, corrupted into causeway. A new French form of the old reaume is here found; it is written roialme. The French let is attached to a Teutonic root, as hamlet. There is a translation in line 13,757; egle is ern. The French place, replacing the old stow, is tacked on to a Teutonic noun, as a resting-place, p. 16. We see the legal verb ateyn, and its participle atteynt of traytorie; our verb attaint comes from this last. In p. 78 we have the plural crueltés, which is something new. In p. 97 stands the phrase avail (depress) his helme; Scott was fond of vail his bonnet.¹ In p. 164 tenante appears, standing for vassal. We have marchis (marchio), p. 177, our earliest form of the word; which seems to show that we should write marquis, not marquess. The word eschele is employed for a division in battle; the échelon movement came much later; mostre (muster) is employed for ostendere, not for our usual sense congregare. In p. 226 cuntre means shire, a sense still in vogue, as "in my country." The word chek is used in the sense of malum in p. 258; do him chek. The noun train expresses mora in p. 263, dolus in p. 295. The word affray usually here means timor; but in p. 326 it slides into the sense of pugna; we still keep the word fray. We see Germerie, p. 2, the new form that was to replace Almayn; the great Flemish city appears as Gaunt, following the French, not the native Flemish, sound; the famous Scotch king (whom the poet saw at Cambridge about 1300), is jeered at as Robin and Robinet; Tomlyn appears as the diminutive of Thomas, and afterwards was used as an English surname.

Robert Manning was a sound English patriot, according to his lights; he thus writes of the Norman Conquest—

"(William) sette us in servage, of fredom felle þe floure, þe Inglis þorgh taliage lyve ȝit in sorow fulle soure (p. 66).
Our fredom þat day for ever toke þe leve (p. 71).
Alle þis praldam, þat now on Ingland es, þorgh Normanz it cam, bondage and destres" (p. 261).

His love of freedom, however, does not take in other countries.

Scotland, whi ne mot I se be sonken to helle ground?" (p. 265).

He admires King Edward the First intensely, and tells us that the Royal banner was pre lebardes raumpand, p. 305; here we see the beast that was to pollute Portugal with his hideous presence, as Napoleon asserted.

There are some pieces in the 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' i., which seem written about 1340. In p. 196 we hear of a cold in the head, a new phrase; the ut is still prefixed to nouns in the old way, as out ydlis (outlying isles), p. 30; out-house was to come centuries later. In p. 196 stands thu schalt be ihelpt, I dare the wedde; this last phrase is our common "I bet you." In p. 272 we hear of Prestere Johan; in the next page of Iselond and Grenelond. In p. 196 stands rosemaryni; the last syllable was to be clipped a hundred years later.

There is a piece, written about this time, in 'Religious and Love Poems' (Early English Text Society). We see the new idiom of Adjectives, werse þan wod (worse than mad), p. 248. There is paraffe (paragraph); the verb wait (vigilare) slides into a new meaning (expectare); the Virgin waytyd here chylde (at Calvary)—that is, watched for His coming, but without hostile intent.

In 1279 a French Dominican had drawn up a religious treatise, which was now, in 1340, turned into the English of Kent by Dan Michel of Northgate, an aged monk of Canterbury. He called his book the 'Ayenbite of Inwyt,' or, Remorse of Conscience (Early English Text Society).¹ He was the last Englishman who adopted an all but purely Teutonic style in many of his sentences; keeping up the old inflexions which had been dropped in nearly all other shires; he says himself, p. 262, that he wrote for "lewd men," mid Engliss of Kent. In the same page he sets forth the Paternoster, the Ave, and the Creed, using but one foreign word in the whole; generalliche (Catholic). But in other parts of his book he brings in shoals of new French words, and gives us many new attempts at translating French terms and idioms; as timlich (temporel), þet wors ys (what is worse), to the death, quod cheap, to greate cheape, ane zwo greate emperur (un si grand empereur), calouwe mous (chauve soriz), wedde dyade (mortgage), ynozbote (satisfaction), dede of armes, þe meste (most) beloved, þe contrarie, aboutestondinges (circumstances), þe writinge (l'Écriture), mi lhord (monsieur), in þet case, hou hi byeth foles! þe oþre zyde, p. 89 (de l'autre côté). The French femme, as in the 'Ancren Riwe,' evidently suggested wifman (ancilla), in p. 67. The foreign vyleyne (uncourteous) is left untranslated in p. 194; but in p. 76 we hear that no cherl can enter heaven; this Teutonic word, which had once stood for freeman, plainly owes its secondary and lower sense to the French vilein, which had long before acquired a baser meaning. The ill-sounding word derived from Bulgaria, the term of abuse that is now so common both on French and English lips, is always appearing in this treatise; it here stands for heretic only. The French construction of prepositions with the infinitive is very plain in p. 134, be god to worþssipie (by worshipping God). Another translation from the French is this; man robs himself of his freedom ine great del, p. 86; our great deal is in constant use now. Noblemen are called greate men, p. 256; a translation of les grands. The French position of adjectives is seen in vader gostlich (ghostly father). The prejudice of heretics against making an oath upon any occasion whatever is referred to in p. 63; the sin of wasting Sunday in idleness and folly is reprov'd in p. 213. The French writer bears hard on Jews and Caorsins for usury.

On the other hand, the 'Ayenbite,' as has been remarked, is a most Teutonic work, and we here see the Southern speech, the most uncorrupted of all our dialects, in much of its old glory. The peculiarities of Shoreham are once more repeated, such as medlé for the French mêlée, and minister in the sense of sacerdos. A Middle English poem of 1240 is set out in p. 129. Our translator has some very old forms, such as traw (arbor), tekþ (docet), eʒtende (octavus); this last reminds us of the Old Frisian tinge in the Southern Homilies of 1120. The French re in verbs is rendered by again, as to ayenweʒe. The use of that as the neuter of the Definite article still lingers on. But even in Kent change is at work. The old forme fader is turned into verste vader, p. 129 ; and the old Southern op (usque ad) seems to have vanished since 1300. The employment of Verbal nouns has come down from the North ; also the words sob, hog, scold, pic (ligo), and the interjection ei! In p. 235 we see the proverb, to zuiche lhorde zuich maine, "like master, like man."

In Vowels the a replaces ea ; the old hleapewince becomes lhapwince, on the road to lapwing. The e is clipped, for the French eschuse becomes schuse, our sluice ; it replaces a, as game for game ; the form elifans is written for olifant, p. 224 ; the old pisa forms the plural pesen. The ea is turned into ye, showing the old sound of the word, as in yealde and yerthe. The Kentish ie, sounded like the French ê, is again found, as sopier (supper). We see the two forms, deau and deawe (ros) in p. 91. The Latin Boethius becomes Boeice in p. 174 ; this led to a new sound of oi, soon to be further developed ; we still have the proper name Boyce. The Southern o replaces a ; wase becomes wose, our ooze ; we have also lompe, bronch, ronsoun, sc londre, and many such. The o replaces e ; ismeped becomes ismoped (smoothed). The u is inserted in buone and guos (anser) ; the old French pitous is seen as piteuous, our piteous.

As to the Consonants, the be is inserted before langian ; we now see our verb belong. The n is struck out ; we see agrund for on ground, p. 91 ; spinnere (aranea) becomes spipre, our spider ; what was elsewhere dronken is pared down to dronke. The r is inserted ; Manning's provende becomes provendre. The former even cristene (fellow Christian) is seen as emcristen. We find the form paci, meaning pass, p. 252 ; we now give a distinct meaning to each of these variations of the Verb.

Among the new Substantives are makere (Creator), volnesse (fulness), spekeman (spokesman), þorn-hog (hedgehog), gememan (gamester), hyere-zigginge (hearsay), wedercoc, ontreupe (untruth), slacnesse. The revivers of Old English in our day speak of fore-words, not prefaces ; had they consulted the 'Ayenbite' they would have seen that vorespeche, the old forespæc, if spelt in the modern way, would have been the right word to use, since the Old English forword meant an agreement. In p. 22 we read of the out-kestinges (offshoots) of a tree ; our outcast has a most different meaning. In p. 259 we find the phrase, a man of worssipe ; hence we now call a magistrate "your worship." In p. 49 stands a man of þe wordle (world), opposed to a man of religion ; we have slightly altered the sense of the first of these. In p. 56 bysinesse still means care, as in the North ; but bysihede is now coined to express curiosity, p. 231 (hence our busybody), and also exquisiteness, p. 228. In p. 1 leaf is used with reference to a book. In p. 111 lost expresses eager devoutness ; and in the same way, in p. 31, onlufthede is used as a synonym for sloth ; we should now call it listlessness. The noun wit is used in p. 251, both in singular and plural, to express wisdom ; alle opre wyttes ys folie ; wit is further used to translate the French sens ; in anopre wyt, p. 96. A word bears two meanings in one sentence in p. 126 ; slezþe, our sleight, expresses first the virtue of prudence, then the wiliness of the Devil ; in 1180 it had stood for skill. In p. 256 stands the new zop zigger ; but this does not express a soothsayer, as we now use the word, but simply a speaker of truth. We have a definition of the lately-coined riztvolnesse in p. 153 ; it seems to be the quality that hits the happy mean between two extremes ; whoever has it will be a sound judge. The Old English ending hed is so much in favour that it is added to French roots ; we see vilhed and poured ; another form of the latter here found is pourté, whence comes the Scotch pourtith ; sobreté is preferred to the old syfernes. In p. 160 men bear fruit to the volle (full) ; this last word is a Substantive, not an adjective, for geetað to fylle is found before the Norman Conquest. Hence our full has long represented two different parts of speech. The old fell is evidently giving place to skin, at least in the South. A good man is spoken of in p. 136 as þe milde herte ; hence our "hearts of oak." We hear of Jeremiah's brechgerdel in p. 205 ; hence must have come Bracegirdle, the name of a famous English actress. A new noun, tomochehede (too-much-ness), is coined in p. 248 to denote excess ; we now talk of "much of a muchness." As to Verbal nouns, we find the new form inguoynge, p. 264, a translation of the French entrée; the old ingang, inzong had now vanished. In the page before, we find the cumbrous ate verste guoynge in; a remarkable change in the method of compounding. In p. 190 we come upon the out-guoynge (gate) of Milan, replacing utgang, outzong, as we saw twenty years earlier.

As to Adjectives, the ending ful is gaining ground; we have sleuvolle (slothful), harmvolle, workvol, restvol, lostvol, and other new forms. In p. 114 hate is coupled with evelwyl (ill-will). In p. 123 we hear grat guod of a man; in p. 209 a prayer comes not to gode (to any good). A sailor, when called by his captain, yerneth ase wode, p. 140; we should here say "runs like mad;" this is a curious dropping of one before the adjective.

In Pronouns, the great innovation is the phrase þe ilke zelve, p. 190 (the self-same); here our author, confused between la même chose and lui même, has used two different English words to translate même. In p. 128 we see he comþ to him-zelve—that is, to his senses. The Passive participle form, this done, occurred in Old English; we now find the Relative coupled with a participle at the beginning of the sentence, as huych y-graunted, p. 264; a very foreign idiom. In p. 115 it is said that we should not hate on þe oþer; this paved the way for our "one another," the nominative followed by the accusative.

Among the Verbs we remark two Auxiliaries coupled with only one infinitive following, ase he ssel (shall) and may do, p. 136. When describing the absence of Past and Future the author writes wypoute wes (was), wypoute ssel by (shall be), p. 104; in our day an old horse is called "one of the has beens" (fuimus Troes). There is bedearw, bedew, also the phrases, pride him (himself), make markat, make memorie of, make semblont (semblance), that, etc.; make ham way (make way for them), breke Sunday, yewe zouke (give suck), do good to, do diligence to keep, etc.;¹ see to it, have þet eye to (have an eye to), have compassioun, have to done mid (do with), stop the ear. In p. 25 hypocrites makeþ ham guode; we should say "make themselves out to be good." In p. 42 let is used in a new sense; let a benefice, with no dative following; as we say "let a house." Our version of non possum quin, dating from 1300, is now further extended; in p. 219 stands hou ssolde (should) he bot overcome, etc. I once more call attention to the hardest idiom in English: in p. 42 men commit simony by markat makinde. This inde here representing the old ing of Verbal nouns, as in the 'Homilies' of 1120, compiled not far from Kent.

As to Adverbs, new ones are here made by adding liche to Active Participles Present. The where, answering to a Relative, is much employed, as whereof, wherby, etc. We say "take bribes right and left;" in p. 40 the translator from the French writes the longer arizthalf and alefthalf. In p. 153 we read of equity proceeding arizt ase line; the stræc, our straight, seems not to have been preserved in the South. In p. 67 mention is made of men who are friends togidere; a new use of the Adverb. There is a new phrase in p. 112; this bread surpasses all things be ver (by far); hou ver is in p. 89. New adverbs are formed like bodilich, vairliche, wrongliche.

Among the new uses of Prepositions we remark the phrase, "to pray God betuene þine tep" (teeth)—that is to say, "in thine heart," p. 210. The confusion between on and in appears in p. 222, where the old on þam gerad gives birth to ine þo onderstondinge (upon that understanding). In p. 248 toppe alle þinges stands for super omnia; this toppe, a truly Kentish phrase, must have given birth to our atop of. One of the Old English senses of bi (secundum) is continued in p. 170; be his wille. This bi, translating the French par, is beginning to oust the old Teutonic of (the Latin ab), placed before the agent; in p. 270 comes þe werm is ymad be him.

The new words akin to the Dutch and German are scom (scum), schoren (fulcure), clapper, and rekeninge (computatio); there is flinder (papilio), whence came Becon's flitermous (vespertilio), a word still known in Kent. We find a vast proportion of French words in this most Teutonic work ; we are reminded of the ‘Ancren Riwe.’ Take such sentences as the following :—þise vour virtues habbeþ diverse offices and mochel ham diverseþ in hire workes ase zayþ an ald filosofe, p. 124 ; (he) his eritage wastede and dispendede ine ribaudie and levede lecherusliche, p. 128. Sometimes the Teutonic and Romance synonyms are set down in the same page, as bozsamnesse, obedience ; ssewere, mirour ; fortune, hap ; his propre blod, elsewhere his ozen ; to deme and damni, p. 137 ; hardiesse is wrongly substituted for hardness in p. 162 ; sleauþe þet me clepeþ ine clergie accidye, p. 16 ; magnanimité is said in p. 164 to be heznesse, gratnesse, and noblesse of wyllhede. We see amonest (admonish), bargayn, difference, article, ingrat, devine (diviner), simulacion, glorify, propreliche, profit, exile, aproprie, dayn (deign), germain, level, distincti (distinguish), discrecion, condescend, fiance (affiance), magnificence, orrible, scribein (scrivener), fornicacion, ecko, resemble, adversary, glue, heiron (heron), launde (lawn), sause, maistresse, perseverance, ariere (arrear), sucre, emeroyd (emerald), to comparison, spirituel, paysible, have his conversacion in heaven, fructify, treat, fry, confusion, afronti, suspicious, terestre, leaven, laver, edefye, grochindeliche (grudgingly), regne, substancial, condemn, virtues cardinales, ordenely, strait, examine, refu (refuge), sustinance, tabernacle, flechi (finch), russoles (rissoles), abundance, magesté, tribe, innumerable, fisike, pope’s bulle, region, temperance, soigneus (careful). The adjective quaint had come to mean elegant, gay, out of the common ;¹ it once slides into the meaning of proud, p. 89 ; a new word, curious, to be found in p. 176, was now used side by side with the old quaint all over England. In p. 40 legal costes are employed in our sense of the term. In p. 96 Christ’s thoughts are called oneste ; but in p. 47 ladies adorn themselves honesteliche to befool the men ; here the adverb must mean gorgeously. The Old English la leof has now become lyeve sire (dear sir), p. 213. In p. 184 privé appears as a term for intimate friend ; 300 years later England used the Spanish form privado in this sense. The un is prefixed to a Romance verb in unjoin. We see the source of our “a round sum,” in p. 234, where the tale of an hondred betokneþ ane rounde figure. We know Shakespere's use of the word quarrel (negotium); in p. 142 the pious man takes his querelles to God; the oldest French meaning of this word is lites. In p. 180 a good man becomes a post in God's temple; this explains our phrase, "from pillar to post."

There are phrases like evele an eyse (ill at ease), in general, stones of pris (price), mochel in dette, he is in porpos to, etc., be in possession of. There is the terrible word hassasis, p. 140, our assassin; it is here brought in to illustrate the obedience of a servant to his master. We know that deer, sheep, etc., are both Singular and Plural; we now find the French pair undergoing the same process; vele (many) payre of robes, p. 258. In p. 152 we find the verb entremetti, which still lingers in Scotland as intromit, though not in the South. We see here both the French form parfit and the revived Latin form perfection, both gentillesse and genty-leté, the old devoutly and the new devocion, corump and corupt; avoerie and adopcioun are found in the same sentence, p. 101. We have already seen porpos or purpos; we now light upon the verb proposent, p. 180, which by an oversight is left in its French form; we still may either purpose or propose. We have here both provendre and porveyance. A new French verb comes in under two different forms in p. 95, flouri and florisse. There are the two forms greynere and gerniere, granary and garner. We have condut (in the sense of conduit); the other form conduct was to come later. We see subprior, which keeps closer to the Latin than Shoreham's sudeakne. We read in p. 61 of a fell beast called hyane (hyæna). In p. 26 the word papelard stands for a hypocrite; it was afterwards to give birth to pope holy. In p. 51 we light upon the tavernyer or tavernhaunter; this has given rise to an English surname. The triacle of p. 17 means a remedy for poison; from this comes treacle. We see boundes (fines), a word which has a puzzling resemblance to the many English nouns derived from bind. There is the comparative graciouslyer, like a similar form in Hampole, much about the same time. The old adverbial liche is added to French roots, as grevousliche. One of our commonest phrases, ine mene time comes in p. 36 ; and in pe mene while is found ten years later. The adjective stable, as we see here, had driven out the Old English stapel (stabilis). In p. 68 we see graces (favours) in the plural ; we still say "stand in her good graces." The word mess (epula) had come to England fifty years earlier ; it is now made a verb, for we see the Verbal noun messinges in p. 71. The verb pay is used here both for placere and solvere. In p. 96 confort is used for solamen.

Sometimes a French word hopelessly puzzles the Kentish monk, as vendange, chenaille (canaille), corvée ; the happy Englishman of 1340 knew less about this last word than did the French peasant of 1789. In p. 153 we hear of four humours or qualites ; in p. 129 these are said to be in the body ; in Chaucer they refer to the mind ; in p. 157 men are said to be colrik, sanguinien, fleumatike, and melanconien. In p. 59 preterit is explained as referring to pinge ypassed, present as referring to nou. I may remark that between 1330 and 1340 three different forms of the Greek word for the huge earth-shaking beast were found in England ; alp (ylp), olifant, and the elifans of the present work. The old augrim is now encroached upon by a new French form, algorisme ; and the two ran parallel with each other till 1625, after which the new form triumphed.

The hermit Hampole's long poem, the 'Pricke of Conscience,' may date from 1340. It is in the Yorkshire dialect, and at once became popular all over England ; for there remain Southern versions of the piece, dating from about 1350.¹ Since Alfred's time no long English poem had hitherto been compiled, that was to enjoy an unbroken popularity for 180 years ; we know that the 'Pricke of Conscience,' together with Wickliffe's works, was studied in secret by Lollard heretics so late as 1520.² This is a proof that our tongue kept fairly steady, in her adherence to old words, after 1290.

² Foxe (Catley's edition), iv. 236.

The e supplants the i, for tricherie now yields the adjective trecherus. The converse of this takes place, when we find chimmé and libard; the latter form is used by Cowper. The forms move and remove appear, where meve and remeve would have been written in other parts of England. The Yorkshire gude (bonus) appears again. As to the Consonants, f is struck out of the middle of a word, for Orrmin's abufan now becomes oboune (the Scotch aboon), in the North. There is a curious confusion between f and p, the French estoffer and the English stoppan, when in p. 198 devils stop (stuff) the sinful in the fire. The h is altered into gh, for our form heghest (highest) stands in p. 28. The g is lopped from the end of a word; Layamon's ræving (spoliatio) becomes ravin, p. 92. In p. 52 regard (this is not requerdon) is changed into reward, just as the old gharma became our warm. The Past Participle loses the final d; fretted (ornatus) becomes frett, p. 245. The n is added, for bedreda becomes bedreden (bedridden), p. 23; it is inserted in the Scandinavian way, for the Southern þretteþe (thirteenth) becomes threttende. The s supplants the old r; lure and frozen become losse and frosen; the s is added to form the Genitive of hell; helles is in p. 77; the old in midde becomes in middes (amidst). The z had long been mistaken for z; hence the French citeien, citezen, becomes citesayne, p. 240. The ruskit of the year 1240 is now turned into our rush (ruere), p. 198.

The Northern love of Verbal nouns is again seen; there is a curious idiom in p. 208; we hear of a stone of ane hundreth mens lyftyng. The favourite Northern habit of compounding with ness is shown in the new word endlesnes, p. 219.

On turning to the Adjectives we see in p. 248 the new forms nerrer (propior) and nerrest; these would have been earlier nerre and next; half of this last word's burden was thus taken away. In p. 22 a man's head becomes dysy; the adjective before this time had meant nothing but stultus. The new happy appears, p. 37. We see in wate (wet) and drie, an instance of Adjectives being used as substantives. The epithet unready had been applied to King Æthelred, meaning that he was "void of rede" (counsel); but this adjective changes its meaning in p. 55, to denote unprepared. In p. 35 stands the new idiom, freshe to assayle us; fresh in p. 144 is further applied to wounds, as if they had been newly inflicted.

A new fashion now arises of prefixing of to the Relative, and thus forming a Genitive; the Relative is separated from its antecedent, a very bad habit; in p. 108 comes ten pinges, þat touches þe day, of whilk (pinges) sum sal be, etc. So much had the old alre (omnium) gone out of use, that in p. 209 stands the pleonasm þe alther-highest place of alle. In p. 250 stands ilkan til other, a foretaste of our curious idiom coupling each other, which arose more than a hundred years later. Hampole goes out of his way to write þe tother alle (omnes alios), a Plural. In p. 219 stands a thousand thousand, an idiom still kept in our Bible; the French million was to come a few years later.

Among the Verbs we remark stand in stede, beg or borrow, make end of, put til pain, be in prayers, do me þat favour, gold was fyned, p. 74. The verb speed had hitherto been Intransitive, but in p. 169 we hear of a process being sped. There is the new Participle uncnawen in p. 10. We find a curious jumble of Infinitive idioms in p. 97.

"Mak þair payn cees,
And þam of þair payn to haf relees."

To hunger had hitherto been an Impersonal Verb, as me hungreþ; in p. 166 stands I hungerd; changes like this are nearly always due to the North. In p. 201 we find both to new and to renovel, the English and French synonyms; our renew is a compound of the two, and came fifty years later.

Among the Adverbs we see the new up-swa-downe; also, in p. 19, turn up þat es down. Instead of the Southern nevertheless stands in p. 100 never þe latter, and this is sometimes used by Tyndale. There is also over sone, p. 106. In p. 94 we find any time, without the at that should have been prefixed; any way, any how, were to follow. An Adverb, as in the 'Cursor Mundi,' is formed from an Active Participle, witandly, p. 155. In p. 8 we see, what wonder es yf, etc.

Among the Prepositions we find the phrases under colour of, by way of grace, p. 98 ; something like this last we saw in the 'Cursor Mundi.' The poet says that he will imagine something, on myne awen head ; we should now say "on my own account." In p. 170 stands impossibel til hym ; the oldest English would have employed the Dative case after the adjective. In p. 52 stands take reward (regard) to ; in p. 250 smell sweet to others ; this last seems to stand for "to the thinking of others," the French à mon avis.

We see moute (moult) akin to the Dutch muiten. The Scandinavian words are swipp (sweep, pass quickly), dased, tattered, clomsen, whence comes our clumsy ; midding (sterquilinium), the Scotch midden ; awkward, here an adverb ; slouh (cutis).

Among the French words are tysyk, despair, unproperly, auctentik, mote (moat), assethe (assets), joyntly, suffishant, moment, trance, sper (sphere). The French caroigne appears both as carion and carayne. The French baraigne appears as barran, with the accent on the first syllable, in p. 70. A man is accused, in p. 80, byfor þe cuntré ; and four lines afterwards men give þair verdite. In p. 164 we first hear of a sergeaunt, in the legal sense of the word. In p. 213 mention is made of blessings and þair contraryes ; a new use of this Adjective. Allege in this poem expresses both the Old English alecgan and the French alléguer. The new words were somewhat puzzling to the poet ; in p. 81 he writes recoverere for our recovery. French phrases continue to oust our old Prepositions ; we now see the source of our as regards and with regard to ; in p. 202 stands als to regard of payne ; in p. 242 comes als to regard to blys. Playne is opposed to mountainous in p. 173. Garette is used, p. 245, of the watch-towers of heaven. In p. 108 Christ comes in proper parson. In p. 142 the Latin austerus and the English stern are ingeniously combined in awsterne. The verb rewel (rule) is formed from the Noun, and another verb, muse, is found for almost the first time ; it is curious that these two verbs were also making their appearance in Kent at this very same date, 1340. There are new forms, such as unproperly, unstableness, peaceableness. In p. 221 comes the line

“Als properly als possible may be.”

We should now strike out the last two words. Deserve is first followed by an Infinitive in p. 225, and we, further on, in p. 230, find certayne to have.

Hampole of course uses a number of Northern phrases, such as noght bot, sculk, scald, stour, win to, almus, hurtle, new-made, fone (pauci), face to face, he behoves, even (just) contrary, three days and a half, draw a tretis. He has the expound of the ‘Cursor Mundi,’ and also a new form, exposicion; we have formed words in English from ponere and positus alike. There is the Northern le (lee), not leow, which is still pronounced lew in Dorset. We still sound subilté in the French way, as Hampole writes it, though we imitate the old Latin form subilty in writing the word.

Besides the poem just considered, we have some prose treatises of Hampole’s (Early English Text Society). They show us what our religious dialect was to be; many French and Latin words appear, and are used far less sparingly than in Tyndale’s works, 200 years later. Indeed, it may be laid down that nearly all the Romance words, to be found in our Version of the Bible, were known in England during the Fourteenth Century. Some of these foreign terms appeared in Kent about the same time as in Yorkshire, that is, in 1340. The Northern dialect of Hampole reminds us of the ‘Cursor Mundi;’ we see once more awkwardly-formed Adverbs, such as lawlyly; also pire, þof, þose, þou is, a being, no force, enterely, a person, by mine ane, it byhovys be lufed; the Verbal Nouns abound. One of the Treatises, p. 19, has been turned into a more Southern dialect; here wern (erant) and goth (eunt) appear.

As to Vowels, u often replaces o, as blude, duse (facit); there is oys as well as use, p. 13; this word must have been pronounced by Yorkshiremen in the true French way, not like the corrupt yuse of the Severn country. As in Hampole’s poetry, repreved makes way for reproffed. There is a new instance of u being mistaken for v, just as the French Jueu became Juev, Juif; in p. 23 plentivos is written for plenteuous, and this often is found as plentifous in the next Century.

Among the Substantives the ending ness is making way even in French words, as grevesnes. The new form business had already appeared in the 'Cursor Mundi'; this is now made Plural in p. 20, besynessis. Another new Plural, likyngis, is found in p. 21. Men have a goode wille to a person, p. 23. The habit, first noticed in the 'Ayenbite,' is continued of setting an adverb after a Verbal Noun, and treating the whole as one word which may be followed by a Genitive; consail es doynge awaye of reches, p. 12; the Scotch louping-on stane is curious. We lost much when we threw aside our power of prefixing prepositions or adverbs to verbs and verbal nouns.

A new ending of Adjectives appears; the foreign able is tacked on to a Teutonic root; we see lufabyll (loveable) in p. 2; and the Northern Wickliffe was rather later to use quenchable. The neodful in the 'Ancren Riwe' had meant nothing but avidus; it now, p. 22, takes the sense of necessarius, as we use the word.

Among the Verbs there are phrases like in tym to come, turne þe braynes, put his traiste in, be-warre of certayne thynges, p. 40; gyfe stede (place) to hym, set in order, take in vayne. We see breke offe and also leve of with no Accusative following; swiked of sinnes had been found in 1180, but this last of is now turned into an Adverb. Participles Active and Passive are coupled in the phrase, þe lufande and þe lufed, p. 34. We saw, about 1310, the French en followed by an Active Participle, which was all literally translated into English; this idiom is now confused with that of Verbal Nouns followed by a Genitive; in p. 15 comes it lyes in lufynge of Godd.

The expression æfre þe oðer man, found in the 'Chronicle' for 1087, is now changed; we see ilke oþer day (every second day), p. 41. We have already seen as to this; as for now first translates quod spectat ad; þis desire may be hadd, as for þe vertu of it, in habyte, p. 34.

Among the Prepositions we find with employed after take, as was foreshadowed in 1280; with whas lufe it es takyn (captivated), p. 2. The by is employed before the agent, as in the 'Ayenbite' previously; goodis kepte bi thi servantis, p. 23. We had long had the phrase, weep over a thing; this use of over (something like the Latin de) is now extended; thynke over thi synnes, p. 36. This over is one of the few prepositions with which we can still compound; it is here fastened to a foreign root; the verb overtravell (overwork) is in p. 17; over was to replace for. We see for the first time our verb overlay, which was long peculiar to the North.

We find a new Verb in p. 12, coming from the Scandinavian tang (sea weed), a man may be tagyld (entangled) with various hindrances.

The new French words are many. The foreign Adjective in ous is made to take our signs of Comparison, a process now most alien to literary English, though in 1340 it was found both in Yorkshire and in Kent; delycyouseste stands in p. 2. The Adjective innocentys is used as a Substantive, p. 11; the Latin word had been brought into France by the clergy not many ages before this time. Hampole speaks of thynge mobill or in-mobill, p. 11. The French corruption sugettis is found in p. 24, differing from the Latin subiecte used in another part of England about this time. We see our common abill to do anything, p. 16, which seems to come from the French habile. In p. 24 stands on the contrary wise; in our Bible the two first words are dropped. Shoreham had used minister for a priest; here in p. 11 we see a new sense of the word, mynastyrs of þe kyng. In p. 15 the word comfort, used in the Plural, seems to change its meaning from strength to pleasure; there is also comfortable. In p. 24 we first find the word curate, used like the French curé and Spanish cura, for one who has the cure of souls. We read here of prelates and oper curatis; and this sense lasted in England for more than 200 years; indeed, in our Liturgy, curate is still used for a parish priest. Skelton's no force, after lasting for 200 years before that poet's time, has now been supplanted by Tyndale's no matter; in p. 21 we see it bryngith into my herte much mater to love hym, where mater stands for constraining force, as in our what is the matter? In p. 25, Christ left the conversacion of men, and went into disserte (desert), and continued in prayers alone. In p. 37 we see maystry, where the old French sense of dominium has slid into vis; hence our masterful. In p. 1 a man savours things, in p. 44 he savours of things, a Scriptural idiom of ours. There are the words, doctour, to clere, concupiscence, sensualite, transform, essential, secondary, illusion, fantasy, frensy, be processe of tyme, refreyne things, to commune with, disposed, frequently, increase, desire, acordandly, unavisedly, at þe instaunce of, imperfite; enjoye in it stands in p. 44, where we should say rejoice, and the two verbs were long used as synonyms.

The 'Tale of Gamelyn,' lately printed by Mr. Skeat, seems to me to belong to the year 1340 or thereabouts, if we weigh the proportion of French and obsolete Teutonic words. It bears marks of the South, but has an East Midland tinge, and may belong to North Warwickshire. The Northern words, never found far to the South of the Great Sundering Line, are lithe (audire), gate (via), skeet (cito), serk (indusium), ferde (timor), hond-fast, awe (timor), not the Southern eye. There are certain forms found earlier in the 'Havelok,' such as queste (bequest), alther (omnium), rig (dorsum). On the other hand, there are certain Severn forms, such as huyre (hire), abegge (abye), the Salopian to rightes; a whole line on Seynt Jame in Galys is quoted, twice over, from a Salopian poem of 1320. The Present ending en is encroaching upon eth, as we wiln (volumus), we spenden. There is the old construction, better is us ther, than, etc., p. 23, also p. 20; this is very different from the they hadden leovere steorve of the Alexander. Another old construction is in p. 22, it ben the schirrefes men.

The o supplants the common u or eo in dolful, p. 18. Among the new Substantives are draw-welle, a talkyng (tale). An outlaw is proclaimed wolves-heed, p. 26, an unusual word since the Conquest. The word man is needlessly added to another substantive, as jugge-man (judex), p. 31; hence the later fisherman and beggarmen. The word deer (feræ) is now set apart to express cervi, p. 4; and this change may be seen in Lancashire about the same time. We know the Irish sorra a bit; the source of this is in p. 33; sorwe have (him) that rekke! The Double Accusative is seen in bind him foot and honde, p. 15.

The word side had for some time been driving out half; in p. 17 stands if I fayle on my syde (part). Men tell how the wynd was went, p. 26 (how things turned). There is the new phrase, light of foot, p. 5. An outlaw's followers are called his mery men, p. 29; also his zonge men, p. 26. The new great is encroaching on the old moche; in p. 9 stands a gret fool, and eight lines lower, a moche schrewe. We have already seen nothing of his; we now have, in p. 10, many tornes of thyme. Among the Verbs are do al that in me is, draw blood, kepe his day. The verb breed is applied in a new sense; a landowner breeds forth beasts, p. 14. An official is reviled as broke-bak scherreve, p. 27; a new formation, like the later crook-back. Men dress (set) things to-rightes, p. 2; this Adverb (few recognise it) is the source of our setting things to rights. The adjective fyn is used as an Adverb; eat wel and fyn, p. 17; the Scotch often say, "he's doing fine." The never is used for not in p. 22, as in Orrmin; we have frendes never oon. The up is used as a verb in p. 20, he up with his staf. The more usual adverb halfinge is replaced by by halves, p. 6. Jurors are on a quest (inquest), p. 32; go on an errand was a very old phrase. A man is nome (taken) into counseil, p. 26; the last word was soon to mean a secret.

There is the Scandinavian loft, p. 6, meaning a garret; the Old English lyft (later lift or luft) meant only air.

The new French words are dress (ponere), pestel, courser, catour (caterer), toret (turret). The spenser (steward) appears in p. 16, whence a great English family took its name. The word quest is shortened from the older en-queste, p. 29. A justice has a clerk, p. 31; a new sense of the word. In p. 32 we hear of the barre in a court of justice.

This poem is curious as introducing us to the machinery of the future Robin Hood ballads; it sets before us the maister outlawe, who walks under woode schawes, with his merry men; his kindness to the poor, and his enmity to abbots and monks, p. 29; his encounters with the Sheriff, on whom due vengeance is taken. The name Robin Hood was not to appear in English verse until 1377. There is an incident, afterwards adopted by Shakespere; the young hero, persecuted by his elder brother, is followed by his faithful servant Adam, who had hore lokkes; the pair, when very hungry, light upon outlaws sitting at meat.

Some Northern poems, that seem to belong to 1340, may be read in Horstmann's 'Altenglische Legenden,' p. 77 and 454. There is the new band-dogge, p. 78; it is also called a hounde. In Scotland we may still hear the Imperative away you go! in p. 79 the command is given, here ze ga and venge me. In p. 465 something is not for þe beste, a new phrase. There is the word tope (ovis) in p. 79; our tup. We see the Superlative chefest; also, I defye þe.

In p. 334 may be found a poem which from the dialect seems to me to have been composed in the Rutland district; there are very few forms now obsolete.

The Avowynge of King Arthur may be found in Robson's 'Three Early English Metrical Romances' (Camden Society). This piece, probably due to Lancashire, seems to be older than the other two printed with it, and may belong to 1340. The Consonant f is struck out, for seofon niht becomes sennyzt, p. 81. There are phrases like stokkes and stonis, mayn and myzte, thay ar gode frindus (friends). The word deor had hitherto expressed any beast; it seems now and henceforward to be set aside for cervus. Something is in the sunne, p. 89 (sunlight). The ranks of society are placed before us in a line found in p. 80; knuzte, squyer, zoman, knave, are alike entertained in hall; the third word here bears more than its sense in the 'Cursor Mundi,' an able-bodied man. In p. 63 a steed is said to be starke ded; here the adjective changes from fortis to rigidus, in a physical sense. The it appears again: a knight vows to wake hit (keep awake), p. 61. The word any, as we saw before, is coming into vogue; in p. 78 stands wille ze any more? In p. 89 a tun bursts in six or in sevyn, the source of our well-known phrase, "at sixes and sevens." A space of time, whether past or future, if it be in contact with the present, may be expressed by this or these; in p. 91 stands thozhe ze sege this sevyn zere. Orrmin's mun had expressed nothing but futurity; we now see it express necessity; thou mun (must) pay, p. 69. Men are bidden to sle care, our kill care, p. 81. In p. 76 stands I dar lay; here wager is dropped. In p. 90 stands cast himselſ away; this phrase long afterwards gave birth to the noun castaway.

Among the Adverbs we find I telle zo as quy (why), p. 85; there is no need of the as here; it is prefixed, just as in as at this time, as yet; and in our age as how? is sometimes found. In p. 67 stands quethur (quo) is thou on way? the source of our whither away? The expression a far land was good Old English; we now hear of the fur (far) syde of the lizte, p. 88; the side most distant from the light. The translation of the Latin quin by but, already seen in 1300, is continued; it now stands after nemo as well as after non; is none of zo but he mun fele, p. 76.

We see the verb dotur (totter), p. 65, akin to the Dutch. There is the Scandinavian tarne (lacus). The French plat is now discarded for the Icelandic flatr; "to fell a man flatte" is in p. 67. The Celtic pert (bold) reappears, after a long disuse, in p. 66.

Among the French words are rebound, bugle, palmer, beuteous. Curious (already seen in the 'Ayenbite') is a word that took root in Northern England, and seems here to mean "well-dressed," applied to maidens, p. 83; it took the sense of carefully made in France in this century, having before meant careful. We hear of rialle servys in p. 80; the idea survives in our to pay royally. Chess is played on a chekkere, p. 84; this noun afterwards gave birth to a verb; it had been written escheke in 1280. A boar casts up his stuffe, p. 59; this word was not as yet used for furniture. There is take entente, p. 91; the en was clipped later. Our issue is written usshe, p. 89, which reminds us of the Italian uscire. The word prisoner had hitherto meant a gaoler; it now takes our modern meaning. Cheer had hitherto expressed vultus; it now connects itself with feasting; we cannot well be merry on an empty stomach; men who have been eating and drinking are said to make als mirry chere als hit were zole day (yule), p. 91. In p. 70 a man is prins of iche play; hence "the prince of letter writers," and such like phrases, implying thorough mastery of some art.

We have an Alliterative poem on Alexander, compiled about 1340 (Early English Text Society, William of Palerne). It seems due to a Salopian bard; the e is much used, as grendes for grindes; there are the three forms kid, kud, and ked (notus), and other marks of the West end of the Great Sundering Line. We see here both the old quell and the new kill. In p. 199 sli and conning become debased in their meaning, for they are used of a magician bent on a wicked act. The hero's pride is shown by his using thou, not ye, even to his father and mother. There are the phrases give up gost, as happes (ut fit), cast (a nativity), go with child, prened (pinned) to the earth. There is the curious verb incle the truthe, p. 196, "to hint, give an inkling of, the truth;" this may be Danish. There is a new idiom in p. 190; they ask Philip to be lord of their land, pei to holden of hym. Here a participle, such as being bound, is dropped after pei; and the Nominative replaces the old Dative Absolute.

There is the Scandinavian rap (ictus), and two words akin to the German; droun (our verb drone) and drift, which here means driving power.

Among the French phrases are his peple (soldiers); he was thought able (skilful). The word inkest is used for blackest, p. 212. In France, about this time, letters of reprisal were granted to an injured man, to pass the march and avenge himself on the foreign foe; the verb mark comes often in this poem, meaning ulcisci; see p. 193. Hence, our letters of mark.

The English translation of the Romance of William of Palerne seems to be due to the same hand that gave us the Alexander. This question is discussed in the Preface by Mr. Skeat, the editor of this poem for the Early English Text Society. The translator of the present piece, who made his version about 1350, seems to have been a poet of renown in his day. He had a high-born patron, the Earl of Hereford, a man more fit for peace than war, one of the great nobles who were fostering the growth of our language about this time; the work of translation from French into English, as we know, had been going on for seventy years. The Alliterative poet thus appeals to English gratitude—

“ Ye that liken in love swiche pinges to here, Preiȝes for þat gode Lord þat gart þis do make,
 The hende Erl of Hereford, Humfray de Boune;
 The gode king Edwardes douȝter was his dere moder;
 He let make þis mater in þis maner speche,
 For hem þat knowe no Frensche, ne never understand ” (p. 175).

We owe to the Salopian love of e that we have, as in this work, dent as well as the older dint (ictus); we confuse the former with the Latin indent. There are here the two forms lebard and lybard; the latter was used by Cowper. There is a change of letters in the old poren (spectare), which now becomes prie; Chaucer was to write later pore and prie; there was also pire, our peer. An i is inserted when fasoun becomes facioun (fashion). An o is thrown out when do of (exue) is made dof in p. 79. Orrmin's huten becomes hoten, our hoot; the word now means simply clamare, not vituperare, as in Orrmin's work. The u replaces y in mures, our moors; it is written mires in other places of this poem. The old reafere (latro) is seen here as revour, an imitation of the French ending. The form sow, as well as sew, is used for suere in p. 62; the Participle is here sowed, but we have made it Strong since this time, writing it sewn. There are the two forms sur and seurte. There is the curious form beauute (bewty) in p. 131.

The w was so often written for g that, as in Hampole, reward is written for regard (look), p. 109; and wallop occurs for gallop. In this poem gest stands for both hospes and historia, the Teutonic and the Romance; these we now distinguish by spelling. The old diken (fodere) is found as well as the new digge, which last we have now made a Strong Verb. The þ is inserted in lengþen (to prolong), p.

39, the old lengan. The n is struck out, for we find a slape, not on slepe, p. 69. The r is making its way into the old gome (the kindred homo); in p. 74 we hear of a gome of Grece; in p. 62 this is written a grom of Grece; our bridegroom (the bredgome of the 'Ayenbite') was yet to come.

The curious word bakkes (vestes) appears in p. 72; it seems to be Salopian, being afterwards used in Piers Plowman; we still have the slang term bags for an important part of our raiment; Lord Eldon was called "Old Bags." We hear of the hacches of a ship; the word comes from the old hæca (a bar). The word boroz is still used in the Singular both for a borough of men and for a burrow of rabbits, as of old; morwe also is employed for both mane and cras. The term wench is used in the honourable sense of the West Midland; it is applied to a Princess in p. 66; gerls, a West country word, had hitherto meant children; but the same Princess and her attendant are called gaye gerles, p. 35. We see here repeated the old terms of endearment of the Severn country, sweting, my swete hert; besides these, there are in p. 59, mi hony, mi hert, dere; in p. 66 comes lef liif (vita). In p. 139 William calls the werwolf mi swete dere best; we have also swete Sir, faire friendes. There are new terms, such as kolier (collier), lif-time, egge tol (edged tool), a drove of beasts. We see the double Accusative in folwe him o (one) fote, p. 130. The noun fill is now extended beyond eating and drinking; loke his fille, p. 33. In p. 101 a new phrase is repeated; a queen is dizt to riztes. There is another new phrase, his quene on hire side was, etc., p. 173; where an addition is made to a previous statement, and it is implied that the queen did not fall below the king. In p. 122 we find to make it oper gate; this phrase long afterwards was turned into another guess, which became common in the Eighteenth Century.

Among the Adjectives tidi is in constant use, now meaning not only seasonable, but fair, worthy. We mark the change of sad from gravis to tristis in p. 28, where a sad sikyng (sighing) is mentioned. We see waywarde, p. 128, which is short for awayward. The word worthy (dignus) is turned into a Substantive, as we use it; þat worþeis chaumber, p. 33. There is lonely, where the a at the beginning has been docked; and botless (without remedy). The old seoc forms a new adjective, sekly (sickly), p. 55. The new word gamsum (gamesome) stands in p. 135; to be afterwards used by Shakespere.

As to the Pronouns, Mr. Skeat, the editor of the poem, gives an admirable dissertation on the use of thou and ye in this piece; see his Preface, p. xli. In p. 142 we have the curious phrase no burn (man) but hemself tweyme (none but their two selves). There is the old ballad phrase seþpe it mizt be no beter in p. 171. The word any, as in Hampole, is coming more and more into vogue; as more þan any wizt elles, p. 130. This elles is much used for alius; daunger or duresse or any despit elles, p. 136; we limit ourselves now to "any thing else," and "any one else." In p. 134 a request is made of the hero to let men go; the answer is þat I wol; a new use of þat, like so I shall. Persons go on alle four, like beasts; this phrase was used in Lancashire about the same time. Another use of the numeral, continued from very old times, is in p. 109; þei be five so fele (many) as we. There is a new idiom in p. 166 which saves repetition; zif he was beloved, zit was Meliors as moche or more; here so is dropped.

We see the verb bell applied to the roar of a bull, p. 66; this sense lasted about a hundred years longer, and the verb was then confined to deer. There is the new verb ferk, to be afterwards used by Shakespere; it is said to be formed from the sound. In p. 137 swelt changes its meaning; it no longer bears its old sense of die, but is used as a synonym for swoon; swetter was to come later. In p. 38 a lady says, y am done (morior); this perhaps stands for for-done; in our time the phrase is, "I am done for." In p. 121 something is said to bode good; the verb later was used in a more confined sense than before, when it had expressed nuntiare. The word override is used for vastare; in our time it can only be used of a horse ill-treated. In p. 140 lete me allone is used for do not trouble yourself. There are phrases like it com in his minde, hold to baie, make silens, to make schort tale. The Infinitive is dropped in easy talk ; A says, "The beast fears us not;" B answers, I ne wot whi it schuld, p. 102. In p. 63 a man fears that bears would have mad of him mete ; the gamekeeper in Pickwick thinks that Mr. Winkle will "make cold meat of some of us." We see the Weak crept, not the old Strong crope, which lasted down to the Reformation. There is a curious change in break ; the beast was broken into halle (irrupit), p. 139 ; this is an imitation of was come (venit).

Among Adverbs, as well as other parts of speech, any is making its way ; onwhar (any where) stands in p. 64 ; on any wise, p. 60, led to our any how. There is how so? p. 39 ; it is fer to þat cuntre ; up happe, the forerunner of Lydgate's perhaps ; in p. 92 happili (our haply) stands for casu ; in p. 133 it seems to express feliciter ; fifty years later a difference was to be made, by means of spelling, between the two adverbs derived from hap. We see but zit used for tamen, p. 73, a kind of needless repetition ; it was soon to be used in the work called by Mandeville's name. In p. 110 men are exhorted to fight, though the enemies were eft as fele (as many again). There is a curious phrase in p. 159, it liked him wel ille, a kind of contradiction in terms. The old wellnigh is now clipped ; in p. 171 stands neiz wepande for wo. In p. 134 stands as wel as we kunne. The word harde now means cito as well as durè ; hie as harde as þei miȝt, p. 42 ; our hard all is well known. In p. 61 a girl is talliche attired ; this word for eleganter is said to come from the Old English tela (bene) ; we still hear people talk of tall (fine) English. The adverb gamely in p. 19 means jucundè ; we have since given it another meaning, that of fortiter. We see a distinction marked between 3a (yea) and 3is ; the latter being the more forcible of the two, just as nay is stronger than no ; this distinction lasted down to the Reformation ; see Mr. Skeat's note on this point.

As to Prepositions, we remark that of, for, and to are often prefixed to Verbs, proving that the poem was written far from the East Midland country. The bi now first gains the force of adipisci ; to com bi skynnes, p. 60—a most curious idiom. The at is developed ; healed atte best, p. 57 (in the best way); armed at alle poyntes, p. 107; atte fulle, p. 156; at arst (first), p. 41; atte last, p. 52. We see att alle in p. 15, I think, for the first time; it seems here to mean by all means; we generally use it for omnino. We have our common sche was out of þe weye in p. 41. There is a new use of to; I hope to hevene king, p. 43; here the hope has some affinity to vow. There is a new use of about; a man beris bred aboute him, p. 64—that is, bears bread on his person. As to on, we find sche brouzt hem on weie, p. 62; an extension of the old phrase “on an errand.” The idiom that appeared in 1320 is repeated in p. 53; Crist zif hem ioye for þe menskfullest messageres þat ever to me come; hence our “begone for a fool;” here the for reminds us of for þat (quia). We find a common phrase of ours, for al þe world such a wolf as we see here; the for seems to English maugre; “though all the world should deny it.” The old sense of to (the Latin dis) was becoming obsolete; for we have the pleonasm to-broke on peces, p. 111; in the next line something is shivered al to peces; it is just possible that in the last phrase the to has more in common with dis than with ad.

We see the oath Marie beginning a sentence, p. 154, where the by is dropped; this phrase, marry, may still be heard in Yorkshire.

The Scandinavian words are the three verbs glimer, spy, and strike (streak).

The words akin to the Dutch are frauht (freighted), and to hamper.

Among the many French words is the adverb cherli (benignè). We see the Plural wages, the French gages; it usually became the Singular wage in the North. There are the two forms pitous and piteuous; agrieve is sometimes used where we should drop the first letter; asaie, not essay, is the form used in this Century. The term seute (the old French corruption of secutio) stands both for causa and venatio. We see lege man; lege lord had already appeared in the ‘Cursor Mundi.’ The flaket of this poem was afterwards to become flagon. There is our common “a numbre of bestes,” p. 78. The word soverayne is used for any superior, such as a provost; hence, in our day, "a sovereign remedy." The title sire is used by a lady to her lover; a king addresses a clown as sire kowherde, p. 170. We followed the French way as yet in talking of the Spaynols; our present form of the word came forty years later. There are phrases like in the mene while, pore puple (people); also fetures, harness (horse trappings, p. 137), metur, kourteour, remnant, amiabul, waste (irritus). We have here the French tax; we imitate the Spanish form of the word when we write task. Mention is made in p. 151 of a gaie maide; this adjective became the established epithet for ladies in English ballads. A man rejoices (fruitur) a realm in p. 132; this sense of the word lasted for another Century and more in England. In p. 102 the verb conjure is used to a supposed ghost or spirit; in p. 15 the word is used simply to express a command. The verb meve (our move) simply means iter facere in p. 137; also remewe, p. 49. The verb restore, p. 129, means restituere; but in p. 94 a park is restored (stocked) with beasts. In p. 117 we read of the coupyng togadere of knights; this word, coming from the French coup, gave us our verb cope. Mention is made of the pers (peers) of Spain, p. 129; we now make a distinction in spelling between this word and pairs of gloves. A new French preposition is now coming in; tidings touchend her father, p. 51; Littré gives no instance of this new-formed preposition before Froissart.

Two Legends of St. Katherine that are in Horstmann's 'Altenglische Legenden,' pp. 236 and 260, seem to belong to the year 1350. In p. 264 comawnde (commend) is written for the proper commende, as we see by the rime. There is the new phrase put out eyzen, put to dede (death); this put was much encroaching on do about this time. The Participle had always, in the oldest English, followed verbs expressing finire; we now see, in p. 263, leve fyghtynge; here we now insert an off.

Somewhere about 1350 'þe old usages of þe Cite of Wynchestre, þat haveþ be y-used in þe tyme of oure elderne,' seem to have been compiled; they exist in a roll, drawn up about forty years later. I gave a specimen of this in Old and Middle English, p. 482.¹ We here see what Standard English would have been in our time had not London supplanted the older capital of Wessex and England; the Southern dialect is well marked; all the Present Plurals end in eþ, and me stands for the indefinite man. These are the three forms—þelke, þilke, þulke (iste); e was a favourite letter in Hampshire as in Kent, for we find meche, legge (lodge), p. 363; the u is also prominent in sullere, buþ, and o-lupy.

The old deagan (tingere) now gives birth to the Noun dyhzer, our dyer, p. 359. The old mæddre becomes mader (madder). The y is inserted in ffyshyere (fisher), p. 353, which reminds us of the Severn country. The interchange between w and b is seen in bypowte (without), p. 349, just as Bill was to come from Will.

We hear of men, p. 349, who are called the “hevedes (heads) of þe Cite;” and also, p. 362, of “þe heved answeze;” here we should now use chief. The noun sale appears, and the very old term smergavel (grease tax), p. 359. The fine old phrase, god men and trewe, stands in p. 359.

There is the expression to hald stal (stall) of shopkeepers. To chaffar becomes a verb for the first time in p. 357. We hear in our days of the output of mines; this word is found as a verb in p. 362. The old foresaid is now written afore-ysayd (aforesaid).

Two words have crept down to Winchester from the North—holleche (omnino) and lane.

There are two new terms that we have in common with the Dutch—tanner and talwz (tallow).

The French words are many, for law terms abound in this piece; we have coroner, fraunk (free), pultrye, pulter, engrosie, severaleche (severally), emplete, attachment, defendaunt. We hear of commune law, p. 361. In p. 354 custome is owed to the King, a sense born by the French word 200 years earlier. Names are entered; houses are y-charched (charged) with certain rates, and in p. 358 we read of horse charche. We see þinges þat toucheþ the rewle of þe town,

p. 349, as in Lancashire; the French verb had borne this meaning in its own country in the previous Century.

Lawrence Minot wrote several short poems in the Northern dialect on the victories of Edward III.; they are in the collection of the Master of the Rolls ('Political Poems,' vol. i.) He alters the old ruze into rie, our rye, and writes stile for the old stigel. He speaks of the Genevayse at Cressy, following the Italian rather than the French form. We had hitherto talked of Almain; Minot now writes about the Duche tongue, which here expresses German both High and Low, p. 63. We see the verb hove (manere) here taking the sense of float, and used in connection with the sea.

In the English Gilds there is a Norwich document of 1350; here we find the shortened forms sexteyn (sekestein) and derge (dirige). There is the new French verb to oward (award) hem, p. 35 (from eswardeir); also the phrase han (have) for his travaille, where we should say trouble.

There are some pieces in 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' ii. 38, 85, 108, which seem to belong to 1350. The word bote had hitherto meant remedium; it now becomes commodum; hit is no bote (use) to mote, ii. p. 108; the phrase to-bote (præterea) had long been used in England. There are the phrases reune in his dette (in debt to him), beg or borrow. We see the source of our take advantage of in p. 38—a dishonest steward, when giving in his accounts, puttes hymself to awauntage, there he shuld be in average. There is the new adverb a pase (apace), p. 98.

In Higden's Latin Chronicle, drawn up about this time, we see the two forms Foukirke and Fouchyrche (the Scotch Falkirk). Again, the l is replaced by u in Meuros (Melrose), as the French col had become cou. The d is struck out, for both Scærdburgh and Scarburgh (Scarborough) are found. See Trevisa (Master of the Rolls), viii. 286, 304.

There are some pieces in Hazlitt's Collection which seem to date from about 1350. Among them is the 'Tournament of Tottenham,' a laughable burlesque of chivalry, iii. 82, perhaps due to North Lincolnshire; and the 'Tale of the Basyn,' which may be Salopian, iii. 44. The a supplants e; we see parson (clericus), and Harry (not Herry, Henry); the s replaces f, as snese (sneeze) for the old fneos-an. We see the kin tacked on to proper names, as Hawkin (Hobbekin), Perkin (Peterkin), Daukin, Timkin, Tomkin; these are still in use as surnames; there is also Gregge (Gregory), and Tirry (Terence). We read of Bayarde the blynde, a horse, iii. 87; this proverbial phrase lasted for 250 years and more. In iii. 53 lewdness adds the sense of libido to that of inscientia; this usage, probably Salopian, was followed by Awdlay, the blind Salopian bard, seventy years later. There are the new Substantives potter, whelebarow, cucry (cooking); burlesque arms are said to be quartered with the mone list, iii. 89; hence our moonshine (nonsense). We light upon the hygh borde (table) in hall. In iii. 91 rich bears the new sense of laughable; that was a rich sikt. In iii. 93 we have, I think, the first appearance of the much disputed word cokeney, here meaning a delicacy; it retained the sense of delicate, pampered, for 230 years.

There is the new phrase of this time, falle in my dette, iii. 46—that is, “in debt to me.” A Numeral is now first coupled with every; every five (iii. 93), “each mess of five persons;” an had long been prefixed to hundred and thousand.

Among the Verbs are go betwene (play the mediator), lead the dance, break heads. There is our phrase for mingere, a literal translation of facere aquam, iii. 47; this was used by Coverdale in his translation of the Bible.

We have the phrase, “they taught him how the katte did snese,” iii. 45; something like our “which way the cat jumped.” There is the oath, be cocks swete wounde, iii. 53; an early instance of softening down the Deity’s name. There is the merry Chaucerian te he! iii. 91.

We see the Scandinavian gravy and trip (move along lightly); hitherto it had been a wrestler’s phrase. Also the Celtic basket.

The French words are experiment, batter, quarter (arms), seasoned, charlett (like our apple charlat), forsed meat, where o replaces a. There is the verb please, instead of the old pay; his speciall, iii. 52, where favourite is understood;

Sirs, in the Plural. In iii. 83 it is doubtful whether bachelery refers to a company of knights or to a company of unwedded men. The verb dress is now used for coquere, iii. 96; men in the next page dresse (address) themselves to a dance.

The Northern Romance of Sir Eglamour ('Thornton Romances,' Camden Society) seems to date from about 1350. We see the French notice contracted into norse, p. 157, and duc turned into dewke, p. 147, a truly English change. In p. 159 the transcriber eighty years later has turned into horse what was evidently written has (raucus). There is the substantive patte (ictus), p. 172, perhaps from plættan (ferire). We see in p. 144 hys fulle of fyght. The ending lin is added to a word, as hoglin, p. 144. The more is still used by us in the sense of major, in the more pity; this may be found in p. 122. The word unwelde adds the new sense of ingens to that of impotens, p. 134.

Among the Verbs we see make signs, take the field, take him to his foot (fight on foot), p. 145; this has led to "take to his heels." In p. 131 one knight strikes his trowthe to another; hence comes "strike a bargain." In p. 146 stands yf (give) you joy of, etc.; here the I, which should head the sentence, is dropped. In p. 132 comes God zylde yow (requite you), a future Shakesperian phrase. We see the new word stompe, which is common to us and the Dutch, applied to a mutilated limb. There is the Scandinavian verb splatt, p. 141, which Shakespere was to make split. As to French words, simple stands for humilis, in p. 124; we know Scott's gentle and simple. We read of the gentyls (like nobles), p. 125; also of a knight's armes (heraldic); he bare aserre (azure) a grype of gold, p. 164. There are the verbs chronicle and bay (latrare); also forces (copiæ); ye parte gode frende, p. 127. In p. 125 stands the adjuration, for Goddys peté, which led to our "for pity's sake." A steed is called "rede as any roone" (roan), p. 146.

There are the statutes of a Lynne Gild (Early English Text Society), drawn up in 1359; where we see blake Mon- unity, p. 97; also boteri (buttery); and have on hande, used of money.

To this time the prose treatises of Dan John Gaytrigg and some other Northern productions seem to belong, though transcribed fourscore years later; they are in 'Religious Pieces in prose and verse' (Early English Text Society). Many words and phrases, afterwards used by Wickliffe, occur in these pieces. The a supplants e in true Northern fashion, for we see the name Barnard; the n is struck out; garnement becomes garment. There are the new substantives dulness, lowliness; the ness was coming in; for the Southern freoscipe here appears as ffrenes, p. 38. We see good followed by to, gude I ame to my chosyne, p. 56. The Participle is used much like an Adjective; how luffande (loving) he es, p. 56. In p. 8 we see an early instance of a mistake common in our days, the wrongful transposition of only; it ought anely to be gyffene to pam pat, etc. (to them alone that, etc.).

Among the Verbs we find, have part with, do your office, keep it to yourself; the put is coming forward, for there is, put him down (crush), put upon him (lay to his charge). There is a curious idiom of the Past Participle Absolute in p. 19, often afterwards repeated; he hase keped þe, and many oper loste (while others are lost). The Participle lykande (liking) is used to express jucundus, p. 49; the Yorkshire Coverdale brought this sense into our Bible in the first chapter of Daniel.

A new idiom appears in p. 55; the as is now prefixed to an Active Participle; it was stulle, as beynge dome (dumb); the as touching was coming in about this time. We now prefix as, if, though, and while to Active Participles. The off is used to express thoroughness; he suppede it off, p. 93.

Among the French words we see a communer, cure of sawle (souls), spice (species), the reverse, chantress. There is the verb fiche, afterwards to be altered into fix, and noyous (noisome). The French en is now set before Teutonic words, as to enpride him, p. 23; this process was to be carried far, and to be much favoured by Shakespere.

There are many Northern poems in Horstmann's 'Altenglische Legenden' that may be referred to 1360; see pp. 1-188. The a replaces e, as quarele. The e is clipped in lufd (amatus) and fond (fanned), p. 158. The o replaces i, as venom. The final y is clipped; Cecill stands for Cecily, p. 159. The v is struck out; lavender becomes lander, p. 156; laundress was to come 200 years later. The sh now expresses the sound of ch at the beginning of a French word; sheynes (vincula) is in p. 104; I think this is the earliest notice we have of the change of initial ch into sh. The z replaces 3, as ze, zour (ye, your), p. 115; this peculiarity lasted for 200 years in Scotland, and may be remarked in the captive Queen Mary's letters.

Among the new Substantives we see a home-cuming, godsande (godsend), slaghter man, sekk clathe (sackcloth), men of halikirk (churchmen, priests), p. 175. As to the Adjectives; fiends will not cease for thin ne thik (for any cause), p. 99; these we now transpose. The word wild gets the new sense of stultus, p. 14; it later, like nice, took the further meaning of lascivus. The word good is in full use; there is the Vocative gude Sir, p. 38; gude man is applied to a Prince, with reference to his wife, who is called his gude lady, p. 84. Two adjectives are coupled, I think, for the first time in p. 21; a grete blak dog. A substantive is dropped in the phrase, þe werst es, when, etc., p. 38. As to Pronouns, there is the new phrase that I have already remarked on, ever (every) thritty, p. 58.

Among the Verbs we find, make gud end, put it to them, gif batail, ask a question, take rote, have chose (choice), it came out (was known), have me excused, days were cumen and gane, spread the bord (hence our slang noun spread). The verb leave is now used of testators; riches was left hym, p. 12. There was a phrase of 1300, his might is benome; now, men are bynomen (benumbed), p. 34, a curious instance of the advance of the Passive voice. The verb rise gets the new sense of rebell, p. 143. We see by the Verbal noun, in p. 57, that the verb hert (encourage) must have appeared; Palsgrave was to write it hearten. There is the new mislive and fob (decipere), p. 138, whence Shakespere's fob off. The old verb roupe (clamare, p. 187) seems to have been confined to the North after 1220; it is still in Scotch use. There is a new phrase translated from the French, p. 11; noght withstanding that; it was soon to appear in Southern prose. The Infinitive follows love; þai loffed to lig, p. 31. Some word like able is dropped in, here is none for to let (stop) þe, p. 48. There is a curious Double Infinitive in p. 69; Simon is worthy to have schame to tak on him Goddes name; the to tak represents for taking. We still use the phrase it should seem that; in p. 145 stands a quene, þat Goddes moder, him thoght, suld seme. The North, unlike the South, turns French verbs into Strong verbs, as not proven, and the old fan (fined, ceased); we see rave for arrived in p. 86.

We have the first hint of across in p. 15; two ways meet on cros. The predicate is not repeated after the adverb in the phrase, sum war ded, and sum ful nere, p. 52. The verb is dropped after and; how sall I live, and þou awaie? p. 178. As to Prepositions, there are answer to þam, sworn to chastity, out of sight, out of minde (insanus), at þi bidding, boun (bound) into England, p. 42. The old wiþ might sometimes mean ab; hence we see part with all (his goods), p. 38; we can now use with in this sense after part and dispense. There is also chaunge his wede wiþ a beggar, p. 177. Prepositions were now separated from the verbs to which they had been prefixed; the old purhboren becomes bare (bore) him thurgh, p. 135.

There is rostiren (gridiron) akin to the German; also the Scandinavian verb glore (glower), and pople (bubble).

Among the Romance words are caldron, rosin, case (of relics), a hamper, sachel, lunatike, gaudes (nugæ), defame, disease (incommodum), pynacle, fawchone, a convers (convert), preve sele, province. A man marries a girl to another person, p. 12. The word point gets a new sense; prove his poynt (purpose), p. 26. The Pope is called the chef curate of Cristendome, p. 51; and curate is elsewhere used for parish priest. A man gives his voice (vote) to another, p. 150. A person is confused for shame, p. 156. The word bill appears in p. 161, meaning something written; this old simple sense still lingers at Eton. The verb cease now governs an Infinitive, p. 65. There is the affirmation, I will warand, made after a statement, p. 104. The foreign en is set before Teutonic roots, as enhigh (exalt), p. 51; this was to become a favourite coinage in later years. There is the curious mongrel blame-worthi, p. 141. Diana appears in male guise, p. 39; the god Dyane. The Latin original, whence these Legends were compiled, is plainly visible in people of Pictavi (men of Poitiers), p. 155.

One of the stories in the 'Handlyng Synne' is referred to in p. 150.

In the same book stands Ipotis, p. 340, which seems to date from this time. There is the curious form izete for the old ge-eten (eaten), p. 346. There is ill in the sense of malus, a mark of the North, p. 344; also the Scandinavian whethene (whence) and nim (ire), p. 344, a mark of the East Midland, though the dialect of the piece is Southern. There are the forms stene (stone) to ded (death); quelle takes the new sense of opprimere, besides its old sense of occidere; quell his pouste (power), p. 345. There are see-cost (coast) and omnipotent.

In the 'Legends of the Holy Rood' (Early English Text Society) there is a Northern piece which seems to date from about 1360. In p. 125 stands to set on (a man) = attack; here some such word as hand must have been dropped after the verb.

About 1360 the poem of Syr Gawayn and the Grene Knight (Early English Text Society) seems to have been compiled; the author has borrowed much from a French original, but is so English as to give a hundred lines to a fox hunt, calling the victim reniarde, the earliest description that we possess of that chase. There is so French a phrase as Nowel for Christmas, p. 3; the hero in p. 25 asks for bone hostel (hospitality). The poem has various Lancashire marks, such as uche, much, ho (illa), þay, hem, þose, quile (hwile).

The a replaces u and i; hence we now find our verb start. The e replaces o, hence welkin; it is clipped, for the old efese becomes evez, our caves. The i stands for ow, for Hampole's verb worow becomes wori, our worry, p. 61; kill (occidere) replaces cull. The French braon is written brawne. We now find abof (above) no longer bove or abufan.

As to Consonants the g is thrown out, for the old isgicel is seen as ysse-ikkle (icicle), p. 24, and the old Perfect bisgod as bisied (busied), p. 4; the g is replaced by w, as tow (trahere). The name Gawain is altered into Wawain whenever the alliteration requires it. The d is turned into g, as in the last letter of the oath bigog, p. 13. The sound sc now becomes sh, for we see schaterande, p. 66; we may now use scatter and shatter in different senses. What was elsewhere of newe is seen as o-newe (anew), p. 3. The l is struck out; tealtrian (whence the Scotch tolter) becomes totter; r is added, for the verb falt of 1240 becomes falter.

We see the Teutonic nes added to foreign words, as forsnes (strength), p. 21. There are new nouns like spere lenpe, half-suster, sideboard, foreland, irons, charcole (wood turned to coal), blod-hound, wod-craft. We read of Nue zeres day, p. 63; the Christmas season is called þe halidayez, p. 33. The word clothes is applied to bed-gear, p. 38. The word grome is connected with horses, p. 36. Arthur's Table is called a broperhede, p. 80. The French ess is tacked on to a Teutonic root, as goddess (goddess), p. 78. We know the phrase "a cast of thine office;" in p. 77 kest expresses dobus. In p. 49 we see the word trweluf; in p. 20 certain knots are called trulofez. The word world is coming in to express indefinite thought; whethen (whence) in worlde he were, p. 28; wyth al þe wonder of þe worlde, p. 8. Hampole had talked of the Five Wittes (senses); in p. 78 a man is robbed of his wyttez, which last word seems here to stand for intellectus, as in the 'Ayenbite.' There is rock as well as roche; Skeat quotes stanrocca from the Old English: the word may be Celtic. In p. 49 a lady calls herself "a young thing," a phrase not yet lost. In p. 51 a sword is called a bront (brand).

Among the Adjectives we find crabbed, also the Superlatives welcomest and cursedest. Substantives are dropped in the phrase in hot and cold, p. 59. There are phrases like the hyze table, a bryzt grene, p. 7; now ar we even, p. 52. There is the truly Lancashire idiom, hunters of the best, p. 37.

The phrase one bare word had been used in 1240; in p. 34 we find I have but bare three days; it is easy to see how our barely came later to English via.

As to Pronouns, Shakespere was fond of using me as an expletive, as Petrucchio's knock me here soundly (the door); in p. 64 we find he grayþez (arrays) me Sir Gawayn, where me is not wanted. The it is becoming prominent, as hit is two myle henne, p. 34; þat is ho (she), p. 78. In the preceding page a French idiom is imitated in myn honoured ladyez; here the pronoun would not have been used earlier. The Plural, we alone, is in p. 39. In p. 23 comes mo (more) nyztez than innoghe (enough). We know the common phrase, "no more nor (than) he did;" in p. 49 we have more or (than) a hundreth.

Among the Verbs the old swap gets the new sense of "make an exchange," p. 35; in the same way, the verb chop, later, bore the two senses of ferire and mutare. In p. 49 comes the expression, I am bihalden (bound), which was later to be followed by a Dative. The verb mark seems to gain a new sense somewhat beyond the sense of videre used by Layamon; a man merkkez wel a boar before hitting him with his weapon, p. 51. The verb swenge becomes intransitive in p. 52; þay swengen (go) to home. There was always a noun hræl, and now we find the transitive verb rele (volvo); the French rouler had most likely some influence here. The verb blush in this poem keeps its old meaning rubere, but takes a new sense intueri, p. 25; from the last comes the noun blusch (look), p. 17; and we still say "at the first blush." The common Passive Participle pight is changed into pyched, p. 25. The old timen had meant nothing but accidere; in p. 71 we first find our phrase "to time a thing." There is the curious Imperative, haf at þe þenne, p. 73, a challenge afterwards repeated in the 'Townley Mysteries.' Here the Imperative seems to stand for the Future, as in the later "fast bind, fast find." There is our common phrase bryng to þe poynt, bend his brows, to layke (play) enterludes, put prys on, I leve wel (believe). The old stiked (hæsit) now becomes stek, our stuck, p. 5; an unusual change. The Infinitive follows other verbs, as fail to do it, born to do it. The Active Participle is dropped; a man in p. 15 appears, his hed in his hande. The Passive Participle seems to imitate the Latin usage; something is done in p. 31, wyth leve lazt (after leave had been got). There is the new phrase she dos hir forth (gets herself out), p. 42; settes hym out (proficiscitur), p. 51. The old might (potuit) is often here replaced by coude. There is a new sense of following; a man's body is described, and we are told that he has all his features folzande, p. 5; we here plainly see how the Latin secundum arose. A knight's clothes, in p. 28, sit on him semly; this sit had meant decere in the 'Ancren Riwle;' fit was to come later. Gawain's host, in p. 30, entertains him, and afterwards knowes him—that is, greets him familiarly; hence our "I won't know him;" Coverdale brought this Northern sense of know into our Bible. The old bigrowen is now supplanted by overgrown, p. 70. The verb ring is used of echoes as well as of bells; a torrent rushed and ronge, p. 70.

Among the Adverbs stands thus much; at þys onez, p. 35 (for this once). There is nue cummen (new come), hezly honowred. The on was coming into use as an adverb; presch on, p. 73—that is, "go on thrashing;" this on was supplanting the older forth.

We see a new use of Prepositions in the following phrases; you have more slyzt bi þe half, p. 49; at his helez (heels), p. 61; she was at him, p. 47; a boar bides at þe bay (at bay), p. 50; do hit out of honde (at once), p. 73.

There is the hunting cry hay! hay! in p. 46, and the oath Mary!

The Scandinavian words are a flat (planum), blunder, rak (vapor), to whar (whir), tayse (tease), blear, sleet, sway, froth, bole; dok (cauda), which has given us a verb, is in p. 7. We hear that mist muged on the moor, p. 66; hence our muggy weather.

The words akin to the Dutch and German are waist, tap, blubber, rabble, baldrick, halow (to holloa), whip off, to dravel (drivel).

There is glaver from the Welsh, p. 46; this may be akin to blather and to the Scotch clavers; there is also the Celtic loupe (fenestra), whence comes our loop-hole.

Among the French words are jeopardy, warble, prayer (prairie, p. 25), paper, crevice, to enclyne, daliaunce, disport, display, repayre (ire), corser, unmanerli, unbar, frenge (fringe), spinny, fauttes, couardise, hautesse (superbia), sever, excellent, remord, rescue; also the Shakesperian brache (canis). We see a cors (of dishes), p. 4; stuffe is used for material, p. 19; a helmet is stuffed within, p. 20. Comaund, in p. 77, is written where we should use commend; one single vowel can make a great difference in the meaning of our words. There is vesture, which took long to come South. A man dresses an article upon his person, p. 65; here the verb is about to slide into our present most usual employment of it. The old twofold of these now becomes double of these, p. 16. In p. 37 we hear of male dere (stags). We see kenel, preserving the Norman sound ken of canis; the more usual chien. In p. 11 a French word is written melly (combat), and this form ought to be revived in our own days. The substantive dainty is made an adjective in p. 40, meaning eximius. The adjective chef is coming into fashion, as pe chef gate. An old lady is called an auncian (ancient), p. 30. The colour blue is mentioned in p. 62; it is from the Old French bloie (cæruleus), and this sound a hundred years later transformed our Teutonic bla or blo (lividus). The verb plede, taken from the law courts, is transferred to common life in p. 42, and means simply rogare. In p. 34 require is used for rogare, as it still is in Scotland. The words patron and soverayn express dominus; and place stands for mansio, p. 13, as we still use it; maneres, in p. 30, is used for courteous behaviour. The word tryfle expresses something concrete, not abstract, in p. 31; it stands for the ornaments of a lady's front. The verb peine (cruciare) stands for laborare in p. 33; hence our later take pains. What we call "the manners of society," appear as pe costez of compaynye, p. 47; hence the later company manners. A man may debate with himself, p. 69; but the word usually expressed pugnare. Men part (separate from each other), p. 79.

The 'Alliterative Poems in the West Midland Dialect,' edited by Dr. Morris for the Early English Text Society, are found in the same manuscript as the Sir Gawayne. They too belong to Lancashire, and seem to date from 1360; there are many Scandinavian forms, and the ho (illa), which still lingers in the above-named county; we see the Northern thay, and the Southern her and hem; there is uch. The verb schin or schun stands for our shall, and is still alive in the Lancashire schunnot.

Among the Vowels the ee encroaches on the old ea and eo; we see Caldee (Chaldæa), and fleez (fleece). The old stiorn becomes stern. The o is found instead of a, as pose (isti); pro (dolor) replaces prá, p. 92. The u and y may be seen coupled together in some words.

The Consonant b is seen in the verb balter, p. 41, where we should use palter or falter. The g is softened into z, in on-yzed, one-eyed, p. 41; here too the d is added at the end, which is new. So also swogan (sonare) becomes souze, our sough, p. 96. A French word appears as partryk, with the consonant made hard at the end; the vowel a has here replaced a French e. For fluctus we have the three forms wage, waze, and wawe. The r is added to a word, for the verb wealtian becomes walter, our welter. The s is clipped; the Adverb grovelings becomes grovelinge, and was later to be mistaken for a Participle. The French is is turned into ish or ich at the end of words; we see cherisch, anguych.

Among the Substantives is stokkez, the well-known instrument of correction, also fepberbed; many sea terms are used in describing Jonah's voyage, crossayl (the first instance of cross appearing as a compound) among them. We see the source of our "further afield," when the Lord in p. 41 bids His servants seek for guests ferre out in þe felde. There is the Alliterative, þe wynde & þe weder (procella), p. 51, which was to become a favourite phrase. Jonah is said to plunge into the whale's belly hele over hed, p. 100, our head over heels; a journey is called a þre dayes dede, p. 102. We see the old fele-kyn side by side with the new birds of mony kyndes, p. 82; here the old cyn (genus) gets confounded with cynde (natura). There are new words like cupborde, dotage, rif (fragmentum). We see how our "worse for wear" arose, when in p. 71 the pearl is said to wax so old in weryng. In p. 49 we hear of the walle-heved (well-head). The word wench is employed in an honourable sense in p. 75, very differently from the London usage of the year 1390. In p. 47 we find penez, cattle pens. The Yorkshire corbun of 1290 becomes corby, p. 51, a word well known in Scotland. In p. 78 stokkes and stones become idols. It is remarked, as something curious, that Belshazzar called his concubines ladies, p. 78. The word foulez expresses domestic poultry in p. 39. The warlaze (warlock) of the North now first expresses magus, p. 84. Our knave, hitherto standing for puer or servus, gets the new meaning of nebulo in p. 63; the Sodom rioters are there called wekked knavez. In p. 82 a man is said to be dronkken as the devel.

Turning to the Adjectives, in p. 94 typped is used for our present extreme. We see skilful, lily-white; ugly is used with an abstract noun, as an ugly unhap, p. 64. In this piece graypely stands for cito or verè; the word still lives in Lancashire as gradely. The new adjective nozty (naughty) appears in p. 78. In p. 59 smopely stands for easily, just as Milton used it. We hear of sluchched clothes in p. 102; this comes from slutch or slich, a word for mud; we often talk now of slosh and slouching.

In p. 56 stands þis onez (this once), with no Preposition before it. Lot boasts of the beauty of his daughters in p. 63, none fairer, þaz I hit say (though I say it); this is soon repeated in Piers Ploughman. We see the new Adverb biloghe (below) in p. 41, a very late compound of be with an Adjective. The Yorkshire no-bot appears in p. 71. In p. 58 a city is said to be distant, no mylez mo þen tweyne, not more than two miles; Orrmin had already used more for longer. In p. 93 comes "to have þe wers" (worse). When the excitement at Sodom is described, it is said that the borough was al up; a new sense conferred upon the up. Abraham, moreover, was up in the morning, p. 67.

Among the Verbs we see Orrmin's intransitive use of keep, p. 45; he keepes no better; in the next page comes the phrase to keep to a thing. In p. 39 a man is said to be forboden þat borze (forbidden the town); the use of the Passive voice was extending. When the Flood came, men feng to þe flyzt (took to flight), p. 49. Oxen pulle in a plow, p. 40; the word is all but new. We find the new verbs, shout, lult (Scotch lilt), wappe (our whop), clatz (clash), a variation of clack. We saw war (cave) in 1170; this now becomes war þe in p. 72. A man bet down a city, p. 76; he might also type down the same, p. 106. The source of our musical strike up is found in p. 79; trumpen strake steven (voice). In p. 95 seamen wezen ankres; a new sense of the old wegan (vehere). There is the form have his will; baþe þem in blod, p. 75, which recalls a High German phrase. A tree is sette to do something, in p. 186. Some verbs change their meaning; thus hamper in p. 76 stands for to pack up. Before this time hove had been used of a man; it is now used of Noah's dove; we make a distinction between a ship's hovering and a bird's hovering. There is a Dutch word daesen, to lose one's wits; this becomes transitive in p. 83, where we hear of a dasande drede, our daze. Pople stands for ruere in p. 101; hence may come our pop. A construction, long disused, reappears when a noun is prefixed to a Past Participle; the Ark is clay daubed, p. 52, but hunger-bitten was in the oldest English. Our Poets have for the last few Centuries been fond of this revived construction.

As to Pronouns, the it is used to begin a sentence, representing a noun that is to follow, hit was hous innoze, (enough) þe heven, p. 62; so Burke wrote, "It is gone, that sensibility," etc. A new idiom is seen in p. 46; the poet, speaking of pairs, says that they are to plesse ayther other; here both the Nominative and the Dative follow the verb, as in our common each other. In p. 48 Noah's family in the Ark is called a meyny of a3te (eight); this is something like Orrmin's þe tale of ehhte.

As to the Prepositions, we see in p. 94 at þe poynt; also at alle peryles, like the at all endes of the 'Cursor Mundi;' hence comes "at your peril." In the next page a man shoots too schort of his aim, just as fail in English was followed by of. In p. 99 an adverb is turned into a preposition, adown þe depe; in the year 1250 of would have come before the Article. We see the source of our "putting up with hardship" in p. 104, where we hear of God's longe abydyng wyth lur (loss); contra was one of the meanings of this Preposition. We say, "by virtue of ruth;" but in p. 100 this appears as þurȝ (through) vertu of rauthē. There is our common on fote.

Among the Interjections we see O, O repeated at the beginning of a sentence in p. 63, where Lot remonstrates with the Sodom rioters. In p. 97 Jonah is asked by his shipmates, "What þe devel hatȝ þou don?"

There is the Celtic gown.

The words akin to the Dutch and German, now first found on our shores, are clem (well known in Lancashire strikes), slobber. In Dutch, laager (lower) stands for sinister; in this piece we find laddebord, our larboard, p. 95. There is swolȝ (vorago), our swallows.

The Scandinavian words are damp, smoulder, smut (filth), bluster, gills (fauces), hurry, skyg (shy, scrupulous), gall (vulnus), trill (volvere), fettle (providere), lomerande (lumbering), bale (of goods), bracken. Rasse (apex), p. 51, reminds us of Dunmail's Raise in the Lake Country. The Scandinavian þjökka (ferire), differing from the Old English þaccian (palpare), gives birth to þacces, our thwacks, p. 101. The Danish odd bears two meanings in this piece; in p. 50 we hear that Noah was six hundred years old "& none odde zeres;" in p. 65 Lot is told that he shall be saved oddely þyn one—that is, "exceptionally and thyself alone." When we now use odd as an adjective, it is usually in a sneering sense; in this poem odd denotes something nobly above the common. There is the Swedish rakel (hasty), to be written rake-hell in more modern times. We see the Danish trine (ire), which Scott used as a slang term, "trine to the nubbing-cheat." The verb lottrande is used in p. 105 to describe Jonah lolling in his bower; this, like our loiter, seems to come from the Scandinavian lotra (go lazily). There are also here two words still in Scotch use, loof and wamble.

Among the French words in the poem are surely, frok, capstan, goblet, the bases, daub, donjoun, to founder, to fester, scoler, decree, abyne, primate, orange, express, sonet (an instrument), pomgarnade, displese, to portray, to bib, to glene, soile (humus), festival, statue, hourle (hurly burly), destiny, plyant, berfray (belfry), lege (subject), sewer (dapifer), alarom, chariote, to devine, a divine, a devinor, governor, declare. In p. 57 we first read of a soun & an hayre (son and heir). In p. 57 Abraham sets out a feast, and the guest mad god chere; we have seen make merry cheer, in the Lancashire poem of 1340. A man is prayed (bidden) to a feast, p. 40; another serves salt at supper, p. 67. Words are lanced (launched forth), p. 102. In p. 62 men are said to be nyse for objecting to salt in their food; this marks the addition of fastidious to the old meaning of the word, foolish, wanton. Comfort, as in Hampole, exchanges the idea of strength for that of pleasure in p. 91, where chastity is said to be God's comfort. The honest is used for honourable in p. 42; honestly arayed; hence the Northern greeting, "honest man!" The substantive bay is used in its architectural sense in p. 79. English endings and prefixes are added to French roots, as masterful, dishonest, merciless, logging. English and French words stand side by side in the phrase (p. 101), pe gotez of py guteres (miswritten guferes). In p. 97 men are herzed out of the ship; this verb comes from the French harier, not from the English hergian, though there is a confusion between the two. In p. 103 we see the home-born verb samne, and in p. 78 the kindred French assemble. Belshazzar, in p. 89, is to be deprived; here no noun follows. Something voyds (disappears) in p. 84; hence the common avoid! In p. 75 comes chaundeler (our chandelier), and three lines further on stands the old condelestik. In p. 73 those besieged in Jerusalem are so shut up that they can forray no goods; the chief object of plundering inroads was fodder or forage. We now confine coast to the sea-side; but in p. 65, as later in our Bible, it might be applied to any borders. The word port had hitherto been used in England for urbs; it now goes back to its rightful sense of harbour, p. 94. The French defend becomes "fend off" in p. 73, and this is still in use. A bower has gracious leaves,

p. 105, thus expressing the Latin gratus. In p. 52 Noah receives the returning dove naytly (neatly, cleverly). In p. 78 a man is avised (minded) to do something; we now keep this French word to translate monere. Belshazzar asks the meaning of þe tyxte (text) of the writing on the wall, p. 86. In p. 73 stands the line,

This specimen shows the inroad of French that was going on all through this century. The phrase a traverce appears in p. 81, leading to our later across.

To Lancashire belong two Romances, printed by Mr. Robson (Camden Society)—the Anturs of Arther and Sir Amadace; they seem to have been composed about 1360. We may remark a change in vowels; a trothe is plighted in p. 17, not the old trouth; thus the word became two-pronged, and our troth and truth express different shades of meaning. The word delicious is here cut down to licious, and this is also written lucius (luscious), p. 17. The confusion between u and v continues; povretée is written pourté, p. 40, as in the ‘Ayenbite’; the Scotch poortith.

The Northern wedsette (mortgage) appears in p. 28. The origin of our hairbreadth crops up in p. 21; him lakket no more to be slayne, butte the brede of hore. Our furst inne the fild stands in p. 43; it refers to a tournament. We see the phrase mylke quyte.

Among the Verbs are deave, p. 11, which has now become transitive. In p. 38 we hear of a gentilman bornne, and in p. 16 of a man fre born; it is curious that the Adjective should stand before the Participle. In the latter page comes the verb match, bearing the sense of to equal. We find the legal to have and to hold, p. 24; putte away servants; be of gud chere. The verb wrek (wreck) appears in p. 44. There is a curious confusion between the Active Participle and the Verbal Noun in p. 15; on hereand hom alle, in the hearing of them all. We have already seen one of the best; we now, p. 26, find bischoppus of the beste.

There is a word akin to the Dutch—delle (vallis).

The Scandinavian gives us naxty, our nasty, p. 7.

Among the French words are spiritualté, session, revenge, clippus (eclipse), sometour (sumpter), wage, the Northern form of our Noun wages. The word spirit is cut down to sprete, p. 5, Shakespere's sprite; the word gost is found in the same page. Instead of the thousand thousand of the Old English the word miliun appears in p. 9. The form soget has been seen already; we now find subiecte, p. 12, an imitation of the Latin form. The French verb broder appears as brauder, p. 16; it was long afterwards confused with the English braid, thanks to the twofold sound of oi; the upshot is the broidered hair of the English Bible. In p. 17 stondart stands for a taper of very large size; hence come our standard trees. In p. 30 a man thinks he has kezte his dede (caught his death). In p. 20 a horse bears the name of Greselle, our Grizzel; this is something like Bayard, the name of Edward the First's steed at the storm of Berwick. In p. 21 stuffe stands for equipment; this led to its sense of furniture. In p. 25 comes the verb doue (endow); and in p. 55 is the Alliterative I dar savely say. The French names of the different pieces of armour may be read in p. 14.

We have already examined two Versions of the 'Cursor Mundi;' we now come to a later version (the Fairfax), drawn up in Lancashire about 1360 (Early English Text Society). I give a few reasons, which incline me to set the date of this version not earlier than the year specified. There is the phrase touchant synne (de peccato), p. 1494, also found in 'William of Palerne;' there is a new phrase of Barbour's: a priest ought to be knawande (a knowing man), p. 1514; undo is used for perdere, as in the Lancashire Alliterative Poems of this date. There are Chaucer's new expressions egment (incitatio) and the foul fiend. The old word aght (opes) is altered into gode, p. 1542; it was soon to disappear altogether. The old gum (homo) is turned into grome, p. 1010. Politeness is making progress; the thou of the older Version is now altered into ye, when a lady is addressed, p. 256.

There are many tokens of Lancashire speech, such as ho (illa), the verb breed with no Accusative following, and graideli (readily), not the graiithli of the Yorkshire versions; the word is peculiar to the North and North-West. There is mone for oportet, p. 1458. The change of the su into sku is most constant, as squete, squilk, squa, etc. The gh is in favour, as halghes, draghes (drags); the at is used for to, as at make. We see both iche and ilka for quisque; both suche and squilk. In p. 1428 comes the line, ho ne zildis ham paire mede (she yields them not their meed); a curious medley of Northern and Southern pronouns; that the Southern element is plain to this day in Lancashire is a curious fact; there is the very Southern form sorouful, not sorful; o often replaces a, as fonding. The i supplants e, as ink. The t is added to s, as quilst (whilst). The Old English siker is often turned into the Latin sicure. We know how often in old-fashioned books f may be mistaken for one form of s; of this there is an early instance in p. 1370; his moder fines (ceases) to soru is here turned into his moder synnis to sorou; we see how the old fneosan became sneeze. There is the new word dreme reder, p. 242, where all the other Versions have dremer. There is our common phrase the gode ship, p. 1422. The old all and some now becomes an (one) and al, p. 98. In p. 910 stands bakker mare (more into the background), a most curious development of the old a bak.

The Lancashire version, though drawn up many years after the oldest Yorkshire version, is sometimes more faithful to what the original must have been, as in p. 1491, where true Shrift is said to be, wreicande, tomsome, propre, stedefast; in the earliest version the two first words are corrupted into wrei and turnsum.

We can here mark the rapid disappearance of old words between 1290 and 1360.

In p. 1521 suernes (ignavia) is so utterly mistaken as to be written squering (swearing). Words like brixel, tor, gersum, and others had become so obsolete that there is no attempt to give any synonym. In p. 1414 Iohan had been made to rime with maidan; the Lancashire transcriber changes the proper name into John.

As to Romance words, two forms of one verb, carke and charge are both found; we hear of a heart being out of state, p. 1384, where we should now talk of condition. We read of Lagh Canon (canon law), in p. 1490.

I may here insert the Southern Version of the 'Cursor Mundi,' which seems to have been made about this time, since it has the new touchynge þe apostlis in the sense of de, p. 21. It may have been compiled near Warwickshire, for we see horesones, p. 681; we have the Midland nor for ne in p. 205. There is now a day (the old idæges), p. 187; now a dayes is found in the Salopian 'Piers Ploughman.' The decay of old Teutonic words in the South, as distinguished from the North, is here most obvious; this process may be remarked from 1290 down to the last Scotch ballad published in our time.

I here give a few words, common to most of the Northern Versions of this piece, that have been struck out of this doght (valuit), late (vultus), ditt (claudere), bird (deceit), men o wale (delecti), wra (angulus), wonges (genæ), gett (custodire), slop (vestigium), barnteme (proles), to spa (prædicere), p. 1088; lovetword (laus), gisel (hostage), graid (paratus), fernet (comitatus), thainhede (servitium), smore (suffocare), hirpild (rugosus), yark (facere), umgang (circuit), choslinges (electi).

Southern version, something quite different being substituted—

In this Southern Version we see the long-lived Salopian uche (quisque); the Northern þair (illorum), er, leli, and mekil are altered into her, ben, truly, and mychel. We see the Participial form weldonde (wielding), p. 251. The Southern i-brought, p. 121, is peculiar to this Version. The Northern fell (mons) was not understood, and was turned into feld, p. 171. The Northern levening (fulmen) is made leitig, our lightening; the old form had been leit. The Northern stand aw is changed into stonde in awe. The word stok takes a new meaning in p. 533, meaning domus (family). This Version sometimes evidently gives the best reading of the original manuscript, as in line 4317.

There is no want of English poems between 1300 and 1360, but there is evidently a want of some Standard, such as there had been down to 1120. A few great men were now at last ready to come forward, and to stamp their impress upon the New English tongue. The sketch, already given by Robert of Brunne, was now to be filled up and to be made permanent, though a few of his Northern peculiarities were to be swept away.

CHAPTER II.

CHAUCERIAN ENGLISH.

BEFORE entering upon the new style of English spoken in London in 1362, and soon to become a model for all the shires South of Trent, we must give a glance backward. It may often be remarked that one form of a great speech drives another form before it. Thus, in our own day, the High German is always encroaching on its Northern neighbour the Low German; and the Low German, in its turn, is always encroaching upon its Northern neighbour the Scandinavian. Something of the like kind might have been seen in England six hundred years ago; but with us the Dano-Anglian speech of the Midland was working down Southwards towards London and Oxford all through the Thirteenth Century. Its influence may be seen so early as the 'Essex Homilies' of 1180; many years later we find a still clearer token of the change. In some hundred Plural substantives that had been used by Layamon soon after 1200, the Southern ending in en was replaced by the Midland ending in es, when Layamon's work came to be written out afresh after 1250. East Midland works became popular in the South, as may be seen by the transcript of the 'Havelok' and the 'Harrowing of Hell.' In the 'Horn,' a Southern work, we find the Present Plural en of the Midland verb replacing the older Plural in eth. In the 'Alexander' (perhaps a Warwickshire work) the Midland I, she, they, and beon encroach upon the true Southern ich, heo, hi, and beoth. Even in Kent we find marks of change: in the sermons of 1290 the contracted forms lord and made are seen instead of louerd and maked. Already mid (cum) was making way for the Northern with. This was the state of things when the 'Handlyng Synne' was given to England soon after 1303; it was believed, though wrongly, to be the translation of a work of the great Bishop Robert's, and it seems to have become the great pattern; from it many a friar and parson all over England must have borrowed the weapons wherewith the Seven Deadly Sins (these play a great part in English song) might be assailed. We have seen another work of Robert Manning's, 'Medytacyuns of the Soper of our Lorde,' a translation from Buonaventura, the well-known oracle of Franciscans abroad. The popularity of these works of the Lincolnshire bard must have spread the influence of the East Midland further and further. Manning heralded the changes in English, alike by his large proportion of French words and by his small proportion of those Teutonic words that were sooner or later to drop.

The following examples will show how the best English of our day follows the East Midland, and eschews the Southern speech that prevailed in London about the year 1300. A is what Manning would have written; B is what was spoken at London in Manning's time.

A. But she and thei are fyled with synnes, and so I have sayd to that lady ilk day; answer, men, is hyt nat so?

B. Ac heo and hi beoth ifuled mid sunnen, and so ichabbe iseid to thilke levedy uche day; answereth, men, nis it nought so?

The last sentence is compiled mainly from the works of Davie, of whom I gave a specimen at page 484 of my former work. It is interesting to see what the tongue of London was thirty years before her first great poet came into the world.

Robert of Gloucester could say in 1300 that England was the only country that held not to her own speech, her "high men" being foreigners.¹ This reproach was taken away sixty years later. By that time it was becoming clearer and clearer that a New Standard of English had arisen, of which Robert Manning was the patriarch; much as Cadmon had been the great light of the Northern Anglian that had fallen before the Danes, and as Alfred had been the great light of the Western Saxon that had fallen before the Frenchmen. Throughout the Fourteenth Century the speech of the shires near Rutland was spreading in all directions; it at length took possession of Oxford and London, and more or less influenced such men as Wicliffe and Chaucer. Gower, when a youth, had written in Latin and French; when old, he wrote in English little differing from that of Manning. This dialect moreover made its way into the North: let any one compare the 'York Mysteries' of 1360 with the version of them made forty years later, and he will see the influence of the Midland tongue.¹ The Western shires bordering on North Wales had long employed a medley of Southern and Northern forms; these were now settling down into something very like Manning's speech, as may be seen in the Salopian specimen given by me. Kent, Gloucestershire, and Lancashire were not so ready to welcome the dialect compounded in or near Rutland; their resistance seems to have lasted throughout the Fourteenth Century; and the bard who wrote 'Piers Ploughman's Vision' after the year 1362, holds to the speech of his own Western shire. Chaucer has given us a most spirited sketch of the Yorkshire speech as it was in his day.² The Northern English had become the Court language at Edinburgh. The Southern dialect, the most unlucky of all our varieties, gave way before her Mercian sister: Dane conquered Saxon. After 1420 no purely Southern English work, of any length, was produced for 440 years. Shakespere, in his Lear,

² The Southerner, on entering Leeds, still reads the old Northern names of Kirkgate and Briggate on two great thoroughfares. May the Leeds magistrates have more wit than those of Edinburgh, whom Scott upbraids for affectation in substituting the modern Square for the ancient Close!

tries his hand upon the Somersetshire tongue; and it also figures in one of the best of the Reformation ballads to be found in Bishop Percy's collection. But Mr. Barnes in our own day was the first to teach England how much pith and sweetness still lingered in the long-neglected homely tongue of Dorset; it seems more akin to Middle English than to New English.¹

A few improvements, not as yet brought from the North, were still wanting; but about 1360 our land had a Standard tongue of her own, welcome alike in the Palace and in the cottage. King Edward the Third, not long after Cressy, lent his countenance to the mother-tongue of his trusty billmen and bowmen. He in 1349 had his shield and surcoat embroidered with his own motto, on this wise:—

“Hay, hay, the wythe swan,
By Godes soule, I am thy man.”

His doublet bore another English device: “it is as it is.”² Trevisa says that before the great Plague of 1349 high and low alike were bent on learning French; it was a common custom: “but sith it is somedele chaunged.” In 1362, a great date indeed, English was made the language of the Law-courts; and this English was neither that of Hampole to the North of the Humber, nor that of Herebert to the South of the Thames. Our old freedom and our old speech had been alike laid in the dust by the great blow of 1066: the former had arisen once more in 1215 and had been thriving amain ever since; the latter was now at last enjoying her own again.

We may look upon Chaucer's English as the speech spoken at Court in the latter days of King Edward III.; high and low alike now prided themselves upon being Englishmen, and held in scorn all men of outlandish birth. The earlier and brighter days of King Harold seemed to have come back again; Hastings had been avenged at Cressy, and our islanders found none to match them in fight, whether the field might lie in France, in Spain, or in Italy. King Edward was happy in his knights, and happy also in the men whom he could employ in civil business, men like Wickliffe and Chaucer.

Not only the Court but a University was now lending its sanction to the speech of the common folk. In 1384 William of Nassington laid a translation into English rimes before the learned men of Cambridge. The Chancellor and the whole of the University spent four days over the work; on the fifth day they pronounced it to be free from heresy and to be grounded on the best authority. Had any errors been found in it, the book would have been burnt at once.¹ For the last thirty years there had been a great stirring up of the English mind; many works on religion had been put forth both in the North and the West, as may be seen in the Preface to Wickliffe's Bible, edited not many years since.

The middle of the Fourteenth Century was the time when English, as it were, made a fresh start, and was prized by high and low alike. I take what follows from an old Lollard work, put forth about 1450, and printed eighty years later, when the term Lollard was being swallowed up by the term Lutheran: "Sir William Thorisby, archbishop of Yorke² did do draw a treatyse in englishe by a worshipfull clercke whose name was Gatryke, in the whiche were conteyned the articles of beleve, the seven dedly synnes, the seven workes of mercy, the X commaundmentes. And sent them in small pagines to the commyn people to learne it and to knowe it, of which yet many a copye^s be in england. . . . Also it is knowen to many men in ye tyme of King Richerd ye II. yat into a parlement was put a bible (bill) by the assent of II archbisshops and of the clergy to adnulle the bible that tyme translated into Englishe with other Englishe bookes of the exposicion off the gospels; whiche when it was harde and seyn of lordes and of the comones, the duke of Lancaster

Jhon answered thereto ryght sharpely, sayenge this sentence: We will not be refuse of all other nacions; for sythen they have Goddes law whiche is the lawe of oure belefe in there owne langage, we will have oures in Englishe whosoever say naye. And this he affermyd with a great othe. Also Thomas Arundell Archebishoppe of Canterbury sayde in a sermon at Westmester at the buryenge of Quene Anne, that it was more joye of here than of any woman that ever he knewe. For she an alien borne hadde in englishe all the IIII gospels with the doctours upon them. And he said that she had sent them to him to examen and he saide that they were good and trewe."¹ Here we see that English had kept its ground in the Palace; an intrusion which would have seemed strange, I suspect, to Edward the Second, the grandfather of stout Duke John. Not long after the Duke's death, an inscription in English was graven upon the brass set up in Higham Ferrars church to the memory of Archbishop Chicheley's brother.

In 1362, or soon afterwards, two renowned English poets must have been at work—Chaucer in London; the author of 'Piers Ploughman' not far from the Severn. They both went on writing for nearly forty years. Of the two, the rustic bard has the more sublime passages; the Court poet, who took long to arrive at his full powers, excels in painting the manners of mankind. He had no real successor for two hundred years; he was the great model; and many poets must have won renown by copying his style, or even fathering their works upon him.

The once despised English now came to be used, not only in legal documents and religious tracts, but even in Church prayers, Royal proclamations, and Parliamentary business; Henry V., a truly national King, gave a great impulse to the use of his native tongue, and in his own writings replaced certain Southern forms by the Northern words that we still use. It is true that English poetry all but died out in the fifty years after Lydgate's time, reminding us of the ninety years that followed the Norman Conquest; but at the same moment our prose made a sudden start, and became a most forcible weapon in the hands of Pecoock, Fortescue, and Mallory. Provincial forms, at least to the South of Trent, were now retiring more and more from the public gaze; at last Caxton and his printing press were about to give a complete victory to the Standard English, spoken at London in 1474; this press was also to arrest the decay of our old Teutonic words, a decay which, since 1290, had been most slow and gradual.

The Old English Drama may well stand at the head of the English works dealt with in this Chapter. The Mysteries, of which mention had already been made in the 'Handlyng Synne,' now come before us. The earliest of the York Plays may date from about this time, though the manuscript containing them is due to a later period.¹ So popular were these Mysteries, that they were performed every year at York down to 1579; they seem to have been dropped, just when theatres began to flourish at London. Some of these works date from about 1360; others seem to be about forty years later; these last I shall analyse further on.² The Northern writer uses same for the Southern togeder, p. 107. The be is clipped, when "get a bairn" replaces beget, p. 104. The k replaces p; the old clappe (strepitus), appears as women's clakke, p. 344. The Northern addition of th is seen in bountith, p. 122; hence the Scotch poortith. There are the new Substantives, horne spone, skelp (ictus); there is the rare fordele (commodum), used afterwards by Gresham and Heywood. In p. 109 woman kynde expresses mulieres, just as the word is used by Scott's Antiquary. A babe is called a mytyng, p. 141, a new application of the term mite. A woman is addressed as my love, p. 424, a new phrase. We hear of cursedness, ¹ These have been well edited by Miss Toulmin Smith (Clarendon Press), and are printed from the Ashburnham Manuscript. They appeared in July 1885, just in time to be inserted here.

² In distinguishing the dates of the Mysteries I have been guided chiefly by the proportion of French words used; the word doutles occurs in the later, but not in the earlier, Mysteries. The system of rimes is also very different.

p. 501; the Americans, who retain so many Yorkshire phrases, still talk of cussedness. In p. 513 stands for-poght (propositum); we have changed the sense of this. As to the Adjectives, the old prætig had meant astutus, it now gets our later sense of the word; a boy is likely to turn out a praty (fine) swayne, p. 170. The word dowty (bonus) begins to slide into fortis; knights are dowty in dedis, p. 404. We read of high and lowe (all men); no man is the wiser (knows a secret), p. 419. As to Pronouns, a child was oures two, p. 109 (belonging to us two); men are none of his, p. 503 (not his friends); we hear of þe selve and þe same (the later self-same), p. 512. The any is inserted needlessly; "why that tree any more than others?" p. 23; it is the same with ever; "what ever can this be?" p. 188; this last perhaps led to the new form for whatsoever. The one refers to a previous noun; "if you have no sword, buy one," p. 238. The old althir mast is used, p. 110, where Gower was soon to use most of all. Among the Verbs are look him in the face, lie in store. Joseph makes a trippe into Egypt, p. 142; the verb trip had been lately used for moving lightly. The verb be takes the new sense of vadere in p. 339; I have bene (to) garre make it; a great change. The verb wit was always undergoing corruption; in p. 501 something is weten (notum); a form that would have startled an earlier generation. The old to (dis) was dropping in the North, though it was to keep its ground in the South for nearly 200 years longer; the verb to-ryff (rive asunder), p. 107, stands quite by itself. On the other hand, the North was to prefix for to Verbs, long after these forms had been dropped in the South. We find the new phrase erlye and late, p. 163. In p. 512 stands "your help to them was not at hame" (ready, familiar); hence, a man is now said to be not at home in certain pursuits. There is the Interjection colle! p. 119; which is suggested as an old form of golly! There are the Scandinavian words dastard and balk (trabs). Among the French words are dewly, rivet, novelty, novellis (news), seeges (chairs), obliss (oblige). A certain act is called a bad bargayne, p. 103; here there is no notion of trade. In carpentering mesures are taken, p.

42 ; this noun was to have a greatly extended sense. The word state stands for dignity, as in Barbour, p. 24. The verb seize gets the new sense of capere, p. 416. There is the French cry, as armes (to arms!) p. 152. The Latin is used for stage directions in p. 190 ; hence our exeunt, etc. The ruffians who crucify our Lord swear by Mahounde, p. 346. A more elaborate system of riming stanzas begins to come in ; see pp. 143, 237, 340, 347 ; but this was to be much further developed in the later 'York Mysteries' of 1400. I give a specimen of the earlier rimes—

“In lele wedlak pou lede þe, Leffe hir noȝt, I forbid þe,
 Na syn of hir pou neven.
 But till hir fast pou spede þe,
 And of hir noȝt pou drede þe,
 It is Goddis sande of heven” (p. 110).

In the statutes of a Lynne Gild of 1368 we see the official called the belleman, p. 55 ; also, if it nede be ; here we usually strike out the it. There is also falsed with the new meaning of mendacium ; hitherto it had meant a state of mind. There are the Norfolk peculiarities geve and xal.

In 1371 were drawn up certain English rules for the masons at work upon York Minster.¹ We here see Saynte Elennes, where day is dropped. The Celtic clock (campana) appears for the first time in English ; it was to supplant the French oriloge ; noon is smitten by the clocke ; we now replace smite by strike. We read of dyner tyme, of a loge, a building for masons, a famous word in our day ; also of the close of the cathedral.

The poem on Sir Degrevant ('Thornton Romances,' Camden Society) seems to belong to 1370, or so ; it is Northern, but has the Lancashire ho (illa) ; and there is the whom (hu-ome) for domus, which still prevails in that county ; also the new Celtic word gown. The rime has sometimes been altered by the transcriber, as morn into morow, p. 215 ; fas into foas, p. 250.

The a is clipped, for we find fray (pugna) instead of affray, p. 248 ; there are the two forms troth and trouȝth (pig- nus); we now make a difference between them. The l is added, for the verb tuse becomes tousel (Scott's towzle), p. 239. The old word nooke is applied to the corner of a letter, p. 184. The hero overthrows many knights in a tournament, and brings their horses, as prizes, to stake, p. 223; can this be the source of our winning the stakes? A man makes a remark one (in) his play, p. 248; here the noun refers, not to action, but to speech; it would have been earlier, in his game. A new Adjective is compounded in p. 245, a two-honde swerde, something like the old twy-ecged (two-edged).

As to Verbs, the old phrase ic hit eom had been altered in the 'Cursor Mundi' to þat ilk es I, and now becomes hyt ys I, p. 207; Chaucer still has the old form. There are the phrases make delay, set heart on. We have two new sporting terms, to draw rivers, p. 182, and to hunt forests, p. 184; that is, the game that is in them. The old how so ever now undergoes a change; how ever that hyt be stands in p. 213. There are new constructions of for; as, fourty for one, p. 208, a phrase also used by Barbour at this time; we should now alter the for into to. In p. 218 stands a gift for a kyng; here some adjective like meet is dropped before the preposition. The foreign afraid is now followed by of, like the native afeard; afreyd of the knight, p. 188. The fashionable oath of this time is hinted at in p. 249, where a man is described as swearing by bones and blood. We see Chaucer's Celtic word cnop (applied to crystal), whence our knob was to come. Among the new French words are hart of grese, bagge (badge), banneret, servitor, scalmuse (shawms), knight erraunt. In p. 183 we read of a knight's place, that is, domain or manor; also of his tenauntrie. In p. 192 chase is used for silva. The old wild deor now makes way for wyld best, p. 197; here stags are meant. The word trayn gains the new meaning of comitatus, p. 224. In p. 228 a knight is described as dressé; this may here refer either to his fine horse or to his fine clothes. In p. 189 we read of lords of honore, leading to our "man of honour" and "maid of honour." In p. 205 comes the favourite ballad phrase, "Thesu save thee and see!"

We see the word ele (aisle of a church) in a Latin inscription of 1370 quoted in Dr. Murray's 'Dictionary.'

In the 'Early English Poems' and 'Lives of Saints,' published by Mr. Furnivall in 1862, there are some pieces that may date from 1370. The dialect is mostly Southern, except that sin, not sithen, occurs in p. 136. We see poysi for poesy, p. 135, a sign that the oy now stood for something besides the French ou and ê. In p. 129 a man is boun to begge, "ready to beg," or "forced to beg," for there seems here a confusion between the Scandinavian bun (paratus) and the English bound (coactus). In p. 122 stands love hym best of eny þing (of all); Chaucer has something like this. The verb sit governs an Accusative; sekenesse sitteþ me, p. 129, hence the later "sit a horse." We see cast acountes, put þi trust in him, do execution (slay), p. 119. Among the French words are, to raump (of lions), queristre (chorister), lettorne (lectern), countures round (counters), fantasie, I enseure thee, þe cours of kynde (nature), p. 119; hence comes our of course.

The 'Romance of the Emperor Octavian' (Percy Society) may date from about 1370. It has the very old word heere (exercitus), elsewhere obsolete; it was compiled in the North, as we see the forms lowse (solvere), wepande, alle-kyn, put til dethe, thro (acer). The poem has been transcribed by a Southern writer, who has changed geste into yeste, land into londe, reame into realme, p. 18; perhaps ödur (alius) into wodur, p. 13. He was evidently puzzled by the Northern ferly (wondrous), p. 49. The a is clipped in semblyd, but prefixed in avengyd; the French lute undergoes the usual English change and becomes lewte. The s is struck out, for the old daies light appears as day lyght. The old verbs mænan (significare) and myntan (statuere) are here confused, as in Chaucer; we see in p. 9, he wiste not what hyt mente. The þ replaces d in thethur, our thither, p. 8. The phrase man child now starts to life again after a long sleep; we also hear of no childys play, p. 35. We see the source of our bowsprit in p. 18, where the sailors catch up an oar or a sprytt (a projecting piece of wood). There seems to be a forestalling of our modern slang in p. 59;

the earls and barons are said to be bolde and swelle (elati). In p. 49 one side is said to be the bettur in the fight, a new sense of the adjective, like our "who is the best man." The Indefinite hyt or it again appears; hyt was woxe nyght, p. 12. In p. 45 a question is put as to the rank of a champion; the answer is nodur lesse nor more than yf hyt my-selſe wore (were), meaning that the champion was myself. Among the Verbs are the phrases, find her way, come of elde (age). The old bid now gains the sense of invitare; thethur was he bede, p. 8. We see the new French words lyenas (lioness), floryns, scabard. A burgess is called "Clement the velayn" (villain), p. 21, where the word keeps its old sense. In p. 5 Rome is said to be wrong-heyred (ruled by the wrong heir), a remarkable instance of turning a noun into a Past Participle. In p. 34 two men fight till one becomes maystyr; the sense of vincere was coming into this word. A man refers to a horse in p. 54, and says, to the emperour therwith y wylle present hym; here a new idiom appears, which the transcriber plainly did not understand.

The Romance of 'Torrent of Portugal,' edited by Mr. Halliwell, seems to have been compiled about 1370; it has much in common with the Lancashire poems, and is full of Northern words, such as to byrl wine, mornynge, aye where (ubique), gar, she mon (must). But it seems to have been transcribed in the next Century, perhaps in Salop or further to the South; there are forms like litulle and woundus (wounds). The ane (unus), in p. 69, has been elsewhere altered into won; there is also whome (home), p. 32. The rimes give a clue to the true old readings; thus the gas and tas in p. 5 have been changed into goos and takythe, much to the loss of harmony; travel and saule become trovel and sole. The old herberwe becomes harburrow (harbour), p. 12; the r is struck out, for forester appears as foster, whence comes a well-known proper name. The n is inserted, for the foreign Portugal is seen as Portingale, a form that long lingered in England. As to the Substantives, the word knave stands, as in Lancashire, not for puer or servus, but for nebulo; it is here applied to a savage giant, p. 6, and this sense of the word appears again in the last edition of 'Piers Plowman' put forth by the aged author; see Skeat's edition, p. 169. The term ward had hitherto stood for custos and custodia; but now, by an odd freak of language, it expresses the opposite, pupillus, p. 57. In p. 104 a knight's lance is called a tymber. Among the Adjectives, blæ loses its old meaning lividus and expresses cæruleus, being confounded with the French bloie, later bleu; asure blay occurs in p. 95. We have now dropped the Northern manfulle, found in p. 7, except for adverbs, and we have stuck to the Southern manly. We find hys squyerys they mornyd, p. 5; this insertion of they is something unusual. Two Strong Verbs are weakened, for we see swellyd and helpt. We come upon if so be that, to unbrydel, lay about him, win erthe (ground) on hym, p. 28; inough to lyve uppon. Something like Manning's idiom, which substituted the Infinitive for a causal sentence, is now repeated; what ellythe yow for to flee? p. 41; who made thee so bold here to dwelle? p. 8; we know our I made bold to, etc., where a me is dropped. There is plainly a translation of fais tu in p. 86; what makist thou (here?). A new Adverb is coined by adding ward to a Preposition, "we have been here two years and onward on the third," p. 92; we should say "well on in the third." In p. 44 a giant's eye is owte. We find the Adjective handsom, p. 55, which here means handy, convenient; it is akin to a Dutch word; the old sense remains in the phrase in our later writers, "bring us off handsomely." There is the Scandinavian gale (aura); the word in its own country meant rabidus. The French words are plate (of armour), force (in the sense of exercitus), p. 89; pile (a building). In p. 13 stands I wole be thy warrant that, etc. The word poyntes is used in a new sense in p. 77, the poyntes of children, that is, their beauties of person; we talk of "the points of a woman."

The Romance of Richard Coer de Lion (Weber's edition) seems to date from about 1370, and may be due to Salop; there is a mixture of Northern and Southern forms. Thus in one line, p. 54, stands beth in pes, lystenes my tale. There are gar, mekil, arn, prickande; on the other hand, we find fuyr. There is the Celtic pouke, and the Salopian kendely, merye, and dente (ictus); this last was to oust dunt, and to circumscribe dint. There is a new idiom that reminds us of Piers Ploughman, armys of his owen, p. 177.

There is a tendency to contract; spirit and heron appear as spryte and hern; the form to-morrow, just as we spell it, is in p. 92. Orrmin's bulaxe now becomes pollax. The old ganed is softened into yaned (yawned); and toh is written tough. The de is clipped at the beginning, for the Gloucestershire word defensable appears as fensable (our Fencibles). The well-known name latymer (interpreter), which had before been written latiner (from the Latin), stands in p. 97, showing the interchange of m and n. The Verb win forms its Past Participle in won, not in wunnen, p. 74. The words outemeste and uttermeste are both found in p. 115; here the r is inserted, as we saw before in shrill and anerli.

Among the Substantives we find the naval terms top-castle and foreship; in p. 99 is the sailor's cry, hevelow and rumbeloo.¹ The French ard is tacked on to a Teutonic root, to compound taylard (caudatus), p. 31; a favourite joke against Englishmen in those days; it lasted for 200 years. A new noun is formed from brew, p. 121; the brouwys so well known in Scotland. In p. 175 the Adjective herteles, being coupled with flint, shows that heart might now bear the sense of compassion.

Layamon had long before employed the phrase many a man; this is now carried further, for in p. 194 stands manye was the man that come. We saw in Layamon's Second Text the new phrase, nothing of his; this usage also is extended in p. 138; non off thy golde. The phrase two so fele (twice as many) occurs both in p. 122 and in p. 251; it is a continuation of a very old English idiom, as, six swa micel.

Among the Verbs we hear of every freetoldande, p. 51; here the Participle stands for a noun. The old verb fremien had been used before of abstract things, as freme (perform) his wille in the 'Havelok'; it is now applied to physical objects, as frame the tree-castel, p. 73, and it becomes a synonym for fabricate. To fall on stands for assail, p. 213. The French creoice, crouche, had long before given birth to a verb for cruce signare; this is imitated in p. 84 by the Icelandic form kross; he is crossed a pilgrim. The hente herte of Gloucester becomes take herte, p. 225. In p. 52 stands fond he no man hym to myssay; here the adjective ready is dropped after man. There are phrases such as hangyd be he that, etc., wente to grounde, grind his teeth, make playn (thorough) werk of, p. 141; lay a deff ear to, wind up a brig (bridge), make it al sure, not sicker. The verb set imitates verbs like come, for in p. 123 stands the sunne was sette.

Among the Adverbs we find ones more, p. 193; fro so ferre, p. 142. The other form of the old swa is also extended in use; we read in p. 253 that fifteen hundred bare wine and als manye (bare) bread.

As to the Prepositions, in stands after arrive, and not the more usual at; aryve in Normandye, p. 254. This in has supplanted the old on; he bad hem goo, in Godes name, p. 196. The King can buy fowls, neythyr for love, neythyr for eye (awe), p. 59; we now usually contrast love and money. Our hand-to-hand fighting is foreshadowed in p. 173; hand be hand to geve bekyr.

The Interjection what now! stands in p. 62. There is the verb bale and tray (alveolus), common to us and to the Dutch. The Scandinavian words are rap (pulsare) and girth; this latter takes the Icelandic th, not the Old English d. Toss is the Scandinavian for spargere; in p. 170 stands win the toss; there is also fetlock. The French words are canevas, in despite of, in present, to brace, to gash, tried silver. We find Bismarck's well-known frye inne oure owne gres, p. 175. In p. 6 we see aborde, our aboard; Dr. Murray makes this a newly-imported French phrase, which was soon regarded as connected with the Old English bord. The word moble stands for furniture, p. 253; in p. 160 Richard pays the Saracens their rent; like our "give them their bellyful."

In 1375 John Barbour, Archdeacon of Aberdeen, gathered up the traditions of his Century, and wrote his poem on the exploits of Robert the Bruce.¹ He himself says :—

In the tyme of the compiling Off this buk, . . .
 wes the yer off grace
A thousand, thre hundyr, sevnty
And fyve.

The work exists in a transcript, made rather more than a hundred years later. The Teutons of the North had not as yet begun to call their language "broad Scotch;" our poet speaks of his Northern dialect as the "Inglistoung," p. 72. He was rewarded with a pension, which was paid down to the time of his death, towards the end of 1395.

The old verb walter becomes welter; on the other hand reng becomes rawng; Ralph and fealty are seen as Rauf and feuty. On the other hand sauce is written salss, p. 58. The two forms yeman and yowman are found in the one page, 96. The former chevetain is altered into chystan, and the same love of contraction appears in Irchery, Irsche (Irish), p. 321. We see knelit for the old knelede, p. 411, a truly Scotch form. We have Marjory instead of Margeris, in p. 408. The o replaces ou, for Gloucestre is written Glosystyr, p. 67; there is also swour (juravit), and repruff, p. 82; Broite is written for Brute, and broil for brule; hence the Gaelic rua (red) was long afterwards written roy, as Rob Roy. In p. 20 poison appears as pus-oun. But the ê sound of oi is also found, as in the verb convoy, also written convey, in other parts of the poem; hence we have two verbs with different shades of meaning in our day. Our word for satis appears both as enewch and inew. The Abbey of Rievaulx is found as Ryfuowis, p. 377; the original au here, which Barbour must have pronounced like ou, is in our days sounded in the other way, like the French â, Rivâs. The b is struck out, for chamber is written chamar, p. 24; there is also Northummyrland. The connexion between f and p is very plain, when Methven is written Meffayn, p. 32. The old u was mistaken for v, hence the French lieutenant appears as lufftenande, p. 281. But there is a fashion of supplanting v by w, as in chewalrus; so the old aboven becomes abowyne, p. 344, which doubtless led the way to aboon; so lavender becomes layndar (our laundress), and the two forms are found in p. 320. The g is struck out in the middle, as Bryd for Brigida, p. 389; in that page the old rig (dorsum) maintains itself against all Southern corruption, as it still does. In the same way the noun spek is found, not speech, in p. 82. We see yet for the East Anglian gate (porta); it still takes the soft sound sometimes in the North. The old muga (acervus) is written mow, p. 68. The quh is used for the old hw, as quhen for hwen. The old word for homage is written manredyn in the right way, p. 321, and is corrupted into manrent, through a false analogy, p. 98. The old frith becomes fyrth (of Forth) in the true Northern way of transposing; it is here applied to sea and not to wood.

As to Substantives, the Romance endings, tacked on to Teutonic roots, are coming in; we find not only thyrldome (thraldom) but also thrillage, p. 6, like the bondage of 1303; there is also yemanry, p. 76; the new dewilry (devilry) appears in p. 86; there is also Irchery (Irishry). There are the new Substantives, undertaking, mainland, outecome, (excursus), slewth-hund, infar (inroad), armful, owting (excursus); here a Preposition gives birth to a Verbal noun. In p. 44 men do a thing with a will, here the article is inserted; in p. 54 men bring all thair thing (property); in p. 255 something has last (endurance), a word well known in our races; in p. 300 men lie slain all in a lump; in p. 343 an enterprise is begun with all handis; in p. 392 cannon are called crakys of wer (war). The old wakeman becomes a wach, p. 201. In p. 325 men are sent on before to take herbery (harbour) for the army; in the next page these men are called herbryouris, our harbingers, showing here a change of meaning. In p. 340 crane bears the sense of engine, not bird. The old gle is used of the joy of heaven in p. 412, just as mirth was used 200 years later; these words can now bear only a far lower meaning. We see some new proper names; Thom Dicson, p. 97, seems to show that Richard had now become Dick; there are Jhone Thomassone, and Gilbertson; Gilbert is seen as Gib (whence comes Gibson) in p. 299. The son in these proper names reminds us of Scandinavia. In p. 205 we hear of Wilyame Francuss, called Frawnssoys in p. 212, which was thought to be a synonym of the French word Fransais, a Frankis man. The Spanish town Corunna was long known as the Groyne (oy for u), and appears as grunye in p. 414; Barbour's modern editor evidently cannot tell what to make of the word, printing it without a capital letter. A well-known Celtic province appears as Bretaynné, riming with Spainye, p. 414. We hear both of the Scottis and of Scottismen, hence the later Scotsman.

There are some new Adjectives, such as scaithful, furred, craggy, and the new form Sotheroun, p. 358. The word mid (medius) had been already set before many nouns, and we now see mydwatter, p. 62, and myd causé (via), p. 365. From strength is formed strengthi, p. 84, just as lengthy has arisen in our own time. The Northern form of expressing pejor was waur; this is turned into warrer in p. 105. The meaning of spedig changes from faustus to celer in p. 127. Our sheer also gains a new sense; there is schor crag in p. 189 (sheer precipice). The old hindema becomes henmaist. There is both the Teutonic cumbyrsum and the Romance combrouss (cumbrous). The last syllable is pared away from likely in it wes lik that he mycht haiff conqueryt, p. 321; a corruption to penetrate to London fifty years later. In p. 77 syndry (sundry) bears first its old meaning separatus, and then takes a new sense, something like quidam; othyr syndry (sundry other men), as we use it mostly now.

As to Pronouns, we saw de ton in 1230; this is seen again in on the ta hand, p. 323, and it became a regular Scotch legal phrase. Barbour is fond of thai and thairis, he and his. We have already seen "do thy best;" in p. 358 comes all thair mast (most) assailyeit thai (doing their utmost). In p. 321 we see fra end till uthyr; we should now say "from one end to the other." Barbour used quweyn for pauci; in Scotland the phrase "a when folk" may still be heard; this keeps alive the old hwon (parvus), which Southern England seems to have lost for the last 700 years. In p. 399 comes we war ynew to put, etc.; here the third word is in the Plural, (numerous enough). The question is asked in p. 389 quhat folk ar thai? the first word answering here to quotus. In p. 263 a man is described as the thrid best knyght, a very terse phrase. In p. 373 stands he wes auchty thowsand; to this we should now add strong.

There are many new phrases where Verbs are employed, such as, hald in cheyff, set a man on him, make thair acquentance, put to confusioune, put thaim to the flycht, giff and tak, make him way, tak his viage, the wawys (waves) break, brek (ruere) on thaim, draw aynd (breath), I am in aynd, tak aynd, lay the clath (cloth), get on fute, he is gottyn in the toure, set tryst to, tak (leap) the wall, make a stopping (halt), p. 147, draw ner to him, lede hay, do his part, tak the feyld, tak gret rowme, brek aray, to say suth (sooth), have na hart to help thaim, to set wachis, mak na schawing (show) of, a weyll-maid body, mak chang (exchange) of, nycht was fallyn, it mayd (told) agayn us. The verb undo adds the meaning of perdere to its old meaning solvere, p. 8. We see he had spyis owt, p. 323; here an Active Participle, like lying, should be the last word but one. The English verb for vigilare had hitherto been intransitive; but we now find thai war wachit (watched), p. 397. On the other hand, fling is intransitive as before, but also governs an Accusative, p. 331. There is a sudden change of tense, well known to ballad-makers, in p. 413; instead of saying in the narrative, "they had him," we find thai haiff had him. In p. 93 stands he put him to the se; we now drop the him and the the. We saw in 1270 that so many hens make a flock; in p. 115 this is carried further, he with thaim maid fyfty. The noun way is now followed by an Infinitive, he was set in gud way to conquer the land, p. 321. Men had hitherto blown an instrument; they now blow tunes on it; blaw the retreat, p. 347. There is the new verb quethair, our quiver, in p. 353; it is said to come from the old cwifer (impiger). There is may fall, like the French peut être, in p. 416. In p. 393 men get wyt of something; perhaps we have confounded wit with wind in later times. We saw hold on his way; the noun is now dropped, and hold forth (proficisci) is in p. 387 ; the phrase is in our days confined to the pulpit.

Among the Adverbs stands nerar togiddy. We now sometimes hear a phrase "he is far away the best ;" in p. 305 stands fer way ma (more) than thai. This fer now expresses not only procul but multum, when set before a Comparative ; fer mair, p. 31, and this comes often in Barbour ; folk are hard pressyt, p. 355. The in is struck out that should have come before na wyss, p. 124 ; this led long afterwards to our no how ; we saw no wayes in the 'Cursor.' So with is struck out in the middle of the phrase, he folowit gud speid, p. 122. The form off seems here to be appropriated to the adverb, leaving the other form of for the preposition ; with hudis (hoods) off, p. 390. In 1300 the phrase as in a Tywesday had been used ; we now see, p. 126, as at this tyme, which remains in our Prayer Book ; here as is not wanted. In p. 412 as, with an Infinitive, is opposed to so with an Adjective ; a wholly new idiom ; a man undertakes sa hey empriss as to ber, etc. ; hence our will you be so good as to, etc. What Chaucer called otherwise appears in Barbour as othir wayis, p. 6 ; leastways is often heard now. The latter poet is not satisfied with the old fullie (turpiter), but has foulyly ; and is fond of repeating this ly in Adverbs, as halyly, manlyly, a process that we dislike.

As to Prepositions, we see ane till ane, p. 17, our man for man ; to win and till occupy stand side by side in p. 6. In p. 36 a bridle slips off his hand ; we have already found in this poem the two forms of this preposition. We have seen strong of hand ; a slight addition is made in p. 29, where we hear of a worthy knyght off his hand. We had in 1290 the Northern phrase the stalworthest geant of one ; this leads the way to Barbour's best off a knyght of all England, p. 375 ; hence the later a jewel of a man. A man might always go on an errand ; this brings us to he was fer on his way, p. 60. In p. 140 the army is all on ster (astir). We saw on his healfe in 1076 ; in p. 176 men are slain apon illk party. The poet uses ner in the sense of prope with an Accusative following ; neh (nigh) had been treated in this way much earlier. The phrase at least had long been known; in p. 106 stands at the maist. In p. 169 comes the expression twa for ane; in p. 145 we have it more at length; thai war sex quhar he wes ane. The old over all had meant ubique; it now means above all things, as in p. 412.

There are some new phrases, used as Interjections, as on thaim! a war-cry which comes pretty often; till armys swyth! (quick to arms), p. 32; help! help! p. 35.

The Scandinavian whisk, morass, moss (palus), appear; also schald, schold (shallow), whence comes our shoal. There is the verb ruffle, akin to the German; also kyt, our kit. There are the Celtic louch (loch), brae, glen, bog, stab, brawl.

The French words are iniquity, endenture, plunge, rally, the plains, capital ennemy, privé consaile, raiss (French raz), abase, pryss (æstimare), ayr aperand, ayr male, sent (odor), reteneu, fagald (faggot), base (low), diswyst (disused), quarter of a myle, novelty, warand (warren), monymendis (muniments), a tailye, regret, enamel. The word cariage is first found in p. 158, where it means the gear for carrying the army's baggage. A new word for if appears; supposs they did so, p. 55; this comes often in later Scotch writers. There is the new track, which has nothing to do with trace. The French had in this Century exchanged their old cataigne, chevetaine, for a near imitation of capitaneus; and Barbour has capitaine, soon to be adopted by Chaucer. The verb venge is making an end of the old wreak. In p. 30 towers are bataillyt (embattled). The Teutonic un is often set before Romance roots, as unarmed; we see also under-wardein, fortravallit, unbeveround (circumdatum); this unbe seems to have been little known in the South after 1280. Men cum to purpos (proposed end), p. 48; in our day they speak to the purpose. In p. 65 seculer stands for layman, and is not opposed to regular. In p. 74 we see the verb confuse; we have this (formed from the Past Participle) as well as confound, formed from the Infinitive. In p. 95 an English knight bears the name of Sanct Jhon, with the accent on the first word, thus foreshadowing our well-known Sinjon. In p. 15 a knight is described as sweyt in cumpany; I suppose that suave would be the word favoured by our modern writers. In p. 115 a man is at first discouraged by his enemies, but afterwards tais till him his spyritis; this strange Plural (it appeared in France during this Century) here expresses courage. In p. 138 men press the king; in p. 173 he presses on them. What we call two thirds appears in p. 140 as twa partis of thaim. In p. 145 deer are in sesoun. We have seen entente; in p. 205 it wes his ententioun to, etc. In p. 309 a man is usyt to fight, in p. 222 he uses to fight; we may now employ used for solebam, but not use for soleo, a curious instance of English nicety. In p. 285 a general dresses his men; the verb is still used in this military sense. We see cruelly (with no idea of inhumanity) coupled with fighting in p. 337, and with wounding in p. 347; it is in our time often used to intensify a phrase, as cruel bad. In p. 421 comes soverane price, where the first word expresses maximus; Piers Ploughman, much about the same time, has soverein salve (remedy). The scouts, sent ahead of an army, are called discourriouris, p. 388, hence our scurvers. The word simple takes the meaning stultus, p. 7, besides its old sense of humilis, which is seen in p. 22. The verb trete expresses tractare in p. 10; Wyntoun afterwards used it in the same sense; in p. 64 the king tretyt with certain folk; and trety stands in p. 216. The old lenten (ver) was going out; for this the Icelandic were is used. The word bounté expresses a valiant feat in p. 45. In p. 97 stuff is used in its Lancashire sense for equipment or means; the confusion between the verbs stop and stuff is very plain in p. 342, where so many ships come that the haven is stoppyt. A person of high rank does things in a quiet easy way; hence an engine is pressed up to a wall gentilly, p. 354; we now make a great difference between genteelly and gently. Our verb unnan (own) has come to stand for confiteri as well as concedere; in the same way a man makes granting (confession) of his sins in p. 381. The verb avise (scrutari) takes the new sense of monere in p. 32; we make it advise. When Sant Jago is mentioned in p. 417 he is called Saynet Jak; this is the French Jacques, not the shortened form of Teutonic Jankin.

I may mention that Barbour has many phrases that carry the mind to Scotland, such as bonet, thai gaderyt (assembled, p. 328), bailie, we be aqwent, thowless, peel (castellum), he behoved to, weird. He has many expressions already found in Northern writers, such as morning, wilful (volens), fall to it, hamlet, sad (fessus), of myself, smertly (cito), get the ourhand, p. 202. He abounds in Verbal Nouns, and is fond of adding ness to Romance roots, as tenderness. For pecus stands catell, p. 122; this Northern sense of the word did not come to London until after 1500. The Old English blode held its ground in the South, but was written blowde by Barbour.

He wrote many Legends of the Saints, to be read in Horstmann's 'Altenglische Legenden,' pp. 189-208. The o replaces e, as gottin for geten; he had gottine (gotten), p. 194. The d is added to round off a word, as expound (expound), p. 194; the rightful expone is in p. 202. The n is inserted, as ensamplar for the usual esample, p. 206; this en is preserved in our Bibles. Among the new Substantives are slawnes, wantones; the word slicht (sleight) is now first used of a trick of the body, not of the mind, p. 201; dowme (doom) in p. 204 means only the judgment or thought of the mind. Among the Adjectives are thankful, nerre of kin to, ill will. The foreign plenteous takes a Teutonic ending, and becomes plentwis, p. 202; just the opposite case to that of righteous. We hear of ripe age, p. 193; elsewhere, a man may be ripe in conversation; here the adjective slides into the sense of sapiens, and is thus used a few years later by King James I.; hence Shakespeare's ripe scholar. Among the Verbs are do an errand, take charge, burst out into teres, p. cviii., pity may be inborne (innate). One of the old senses of sceotan had been torquere; hence men are shot into a place, p. 201, as we shoot rubbish. The verb cleave (hære), which had hitherto been Weak, makes its Perfect clafe, p. 196. There is the new phrase syd be syd (side), p. 207.

We see the Scandinavian swamp derived from swim; men through dropsy are made swampe, p. 208.

Among the Romance words are heretable, retentive, ex- presly, demand, inflame, comprehend. There is determe in the sense of statuere, our determine, p. 194. Light fails a man, p. 196. The verb chase takes the sense of abigere, p. 201; a sense borne sixty years later by the other form of the French verb, catch. The verb inform has the sense of instruere, p. 204. The verb excede begins to supplant the old pass, as later in Tyndale. The verb conjure means simply orare, p. 203. The two forms werdoun and reward may be seen in p. 205. There is line of flesh (family), and change his thocht (mind), p. 205.

We have the statutes of a London Gild of 1375 (Early English Text Society, p. 1), which are not unlike Chaucer's dialect; we find both beth and ben (sunt); the Infinitive and the prefix to the Past Participle are clipped. There is noght for not, and the Southern sustren and oper (aut). Orrmin's same and somewhat have now reached London. We have here þe most wyse instead of the old wisest; also do her diligence, do þe duytes, the first appearance of the last-named substantive in England. Two foreign words are used as prepositions; touchyng þe profit (which we saw in Salop in 1350), and duryng his enpresonement; in France the Participle would have stood last. The form acompt is found, whence comes Shakespere's day of compt; the statutes of the Gild are called a papir, leading the way to our state paper. In a Lynne Gild of 1376 (in the same volume) we read of a man of gode conversacioun (a word used in this sense in France down to Calvin's time), and of paying fees, a new sense of the last word. There is a later Lynne Gild of 1383, where the old Midland Participle in ende is often found. We here find, as in 1350, the Verbal Noun followed by an adverb; have a spekyng togedyr (conference), p. 52; a phrase like this makes us mourn over the loss of our old compounding power. We find, also, the phrase in tyme comyng, p. 53. There are the statutes of a Norwich Gild in 1385, where stands the word sporyer (spurrier), p. 42; here the y or i of the Severn country is inserted before the Teutonic er. The form cladde, a Scandinavian word that we saw in East Anglia in 1230, appears once more in p. 43.

I place, under the year 1377, the far-renowned Allegory of Piers Ploughman, written as it seems by a poet who dwelt on the Great Sundering Line, and who therefore used both Southern and Midland forms. The author seems to have belonged to Salop. He brought out three editions of his great Alliterative work; the first half of it in 1362, the whole in 1377, a third, with additions and corrections, in 1393.¹ Many copies, made from his original text (a most popular work), still survive, and show a great variety of dialects about the year 1400; thus we have bridale, bredale, brudale, and bryudale, all four; also rusche, rische, reshe. His Southern leanings are shown by forms like which (qualis), hue (illa), hy (illi), hure (audire), zorn (cucurrit), ac (sed), o þing, church, wantowen (lascivus), and the Genitive Plural of a new word, lollarene. Among the Northern forms are gar (facere), til (ad), loupe (saliat, p. 76), aren, egges. We see both dike and diche for fossa. There is the favourite Salopian Plural Substantive ending in us, as frerus; also the Salopian form selver for silver. The a replaces the French e, as garlaunde for the former gerland; also eo, for teor becomes tar; also o, for mal (macula) becomes mole. The e replaces eo, as weke, our wick; it replaces o, as welkin. The French du (debitus) appears as dewe and diwe, showing our love for the ew sound, as we turned Duc into Dewk; there is also deul (dolor), p. 145. On the other hand, the old seowian (the kindred Latin suere) appears not only as sew but as sow; we now unluckily sound it as so, and confound it with the verb for seminare. We have seen pore (spectare) in the year 1280; another form piren (our peer) now crops up. There is britel (fragilis) as well as the older brotel. We have seen bowiar in 1300; lawyer is now found in the same way. We find both reame, reume, and reome for regnum. The different manuscripts show the uncertainty about the sound of letters; thus our boil (pustula) appears in p. 431, but is also written bule, byle, and bele; boil (bullire) is seen in this form, and also as buyl, p. 383; toil (laborare) is in p. 422, with the variations tule, tile, and tyle. The combination build marks the Severn country, as do forms not equally long-lived, such as pruyde and fuyr. The old stól (sedes) is replaced by stoul; the cloches of Mapes give birth to the verb clucche; and the word for anas appears both as doke and duke.

As to Consonants, the b is inserted, as slumber for the old slumer. The k sound is preserved in a foreign comparative adverb, as reverentloker, p. 141; and poke is used instead of pouch; there are the new forms cull and kill for occidere, as well as the old quell, p. 423. The old syegen (peccare) holds its ground by the side of the new synnen, p. 229; but Layamon's nizene (novem) becomes nine. The former geloened is now seen as ylent, p. 108. There are the two forms drouhþe and droghte. Ninth is seen for the first time with n inserted; but elsewhere the n is struck out, as in a slepe, p. 88; we have a window a worchyng, p. 44, where this a (on) first stands before a Verbal Noun. Hampole's in middes becomes amyddes (amidst), p. 164. The s is inserted; baptesme appears, not baptim; and siþen is sometimes written siþenes, on the road to since. As to r, we find hors (raucus) as well as hos, the old hás. The old wydewa now becomes widewer (widower).

We saw spilbred in 1280; much longer compound names are now formed, as Sire Werch-well-with-thyn-hand, Waryn wrynge-lawe; a horse is called soffre-til-ich-see-my-tyme, p. 72. In these phrases Bunyan did not go quite so far as his Salopian forerunner. The ending estre no longer expressed a female, for we see wafrestre (wafer maker), and canonistre (canonist); spinnester in p. 107 expresses, not our idea connected with the word, but spinner. The brewester of one copy, p. 156, has been altered into ale-wife in another. Webba did not last beyond the year 1400; it is replaced by wever and webbester, which no longer means textrix, as of old. Our common goer is formed from the verb, for we find forgoere; go was supplanting gang. The old ending ern was now all but gone; instead of the former brewcern we find brewhouse, p. 163. The word ravine gives birth to another noun, ravener, p. 309. The kin at the end of proper names is in full use, as Watkin, Haukin; it is tacked on to Romance words, as fauntekyn (infant), p. 159. Manning's Joan appears as Jonet; his nigun now becomes nigard, p. 359. The confusion between Teutonic and Romance endings is very plain in tale-tellour, p. 442. There are new nouns, as titerer, loby (looby), kyton (kitten), kitte-pors (cutpurse), styues (lupanar), pikstaf, hangman, pykeporse, latch, brocage, brocor (broker), borwton (borough town), baude (lena), batte-nelde (packneedle), lande-leper (pilgrim), collop, ragamoffin (applied to a fiend), kynde wit (Latimer's mother wit), wisp, worsted, beggerie, hous-bonderie. We see the two forms lorel and losel (nebulo); the word loller here means a fellow, who, under pretence of religion, lives in idleness; a few years later it was to be applied to heretics. In p. 134 we see the old, all but obsolete, form bergh (collis), which we now write barrow; our iceberg is a word borrowed from our Teutonic brethren. Team, which had meant sequela, is first applied to oxen in p. 158. We hear, in p. 197, that something is not worth a carse; here is the change from cress to a sound like our curse. We see wyrdes (destinies) in p. 227; this was becoming obsolete, at least in the South, for most of the manuscripts alter it into words. The suffix kin is dropped in proper names like Tomme, Watte, Symme, Bette; we find here Letice, Hicke, Sesse (Cis); in p. 350 the Good Samaritan's horse is called both Lyarde and Bayarde. Pernel, whence the poet Parnell derived his name, is the short for Petronilla, and is usually here applied to a bad character. On the other hand, Piers the Ploughman, standing for Christ himself, is sometimes called Perkin, p. 173; the name became afterwards a synonym for an impostor. In p. 75 a man pays handy-dandy, one of the first instances of our truly English love of a jingle, such as Skelton employed. Old forms, like ingung and gang (ire), are seen for the last time in the South. In p. 141 we learn that it is hard to know, in the churchyard, a knight from a knave or a queyne from a queene; the higher and lower meanings of the old cwèn are here brought into sharp contrast, thanks to spelling. In former times ceorl had been used for freeman; in p. 66 the word had sunk so low that it is altered in one manuscript into prall; see also p. 401. The term wench is applied to the Virgin in p. 336, and to a harlot in p. 422; the honourable sense was to prevail in the North, the base sense in the South. It is curious that boy had been used for a torturer or hangman ever since 1280, reminding us of the Italian boja; this meaning reappears in p. 371. Girl in p. 162 still bears its old Salopian meaning child. Our word mirth had then a far loftier sense than now; in p. 374 it is applied to the feelings with which we should regard Christ's birth; this survives in the phrase "awful mirth," applied, in a hymn, to the service of God. We hear of men bolted (fettered) with iron, p. 146; bolt had added the sense of catena to its old meaning sagitta. The word grote had been used for fragmentum; it now expresses a coin, p. 107. Prayer had been expressed by bede; this latter is now transferred to the little round substances used to reckon the number of prayers said; we find a peire of bedes. We saw, about 1300, the phrases no manere harm and nakin harm; we now, in p. 374, have the longer-lived eny kynde of creature side by side with eny kynne þynge, p. 153. A drunken man is carried to bed, in p. 118, with al þe wo of þe worlde; we should now say "with all the trouble in the world." A noun has another noun of price prefixed to it in the phrase halpeny ale, p. 156. In p. 163 an Adverb is tacked on to a noun; leperes aboute, "roving over the land." In p. 125 stands in zoure dep-deynge (dying); the form "die the death" had been often used; death is now set before the Verbal Noun. Both grom and gome are employed in this poem. In p. 384 comes the new phrase "they are mine, body and soule." In p. 128 the Sun is darkened for a tyme.

Among the new Adjectives are baudi, lousi, prede-bare, peyvesshe (peevish), wederwise, wet-shod, bler-eyed. There is bytelbrowed, which we now confound with beetle, whereas it comes from the Old English bitian (acuere). A Passive Participle is made an Adjective and takes a Comparative, blessedere, p. 223; there is also broke-legged, p. 146, where two Past Participles are united. The Adjective is prefixed to an Active Participle, lowe-lyvinge men, p. 257. When we see a Southern phrase like a muche (great) man, we understand how Much Wenlock came to exist down to our days; another form of the word remains in Mickle Benton, further to the North. The Americans talk of "having a good time;" in p. 373 the Jews are told zoure goode dayes beoþ don.

As to Pronouns, Mätzner quotes a curious idiom from this poet; Lord, y-worshipped be the; this explains our it's me; in the same way the French employ moi, toi, and lui as Nominatives. We saw nothing of his in 1260; the idiom is now extended, for we find moneye of thyn owen. In p. 405 stands our common furst and formest.

Among Verbs there is a new idiom, why calle hym Crist? here should ye is dropped before the Infinitive. There is a curious exchange of would for should in ich sholde rapere sterve, p. 111; we still say "I should prefer to starve." In p. 382 stands ich wol beo brent, unless, etc.; this is the idiom used in more modern curses. There are new verbs like wrangle (from wring), unpick a lock, herd (congregari), throb. In go to werke, p. 105, nothing toilsome is suggested; nothing but pleasure is in the speaker's mind. In p. 440 God, it is said, made all things, and nempnede hem names—the first hint of our calling names. In p. 407 something cam out (became known). The poet sometimes forms happy new compounds, as land-tylynge people, p. 213; other poets should tread in his steps. In p. 110 we see how overreach came to mean cheat; a rogue, when reaping, overreaches into his neighbour's corn.

Among the Adverbs there is a most curious survival of the old form lytulum and lytulum, p. 327. This seems to show that our poet, like Layamon, was a student of antiquity; in further proof of this he writes gon a begged, "go a begging," p. 146, in imitation of the old gan an huntath, "go a hunting." In p. 88 trees were blown down, and turned upward here tayl; we now say "tail upward." In p. 444 we see how hardly came to express vix seventy years later; ful hard is if they recover. In p. 406 Christ is killed on croys-wise, the source of the Biblical Adverb cross wise. The adverb happily had been hitherto used for feliciter; in p. 136 it is cut down to hapliche, and expresses fortasse; here is an instance of the omission of one letter in a word enabling us to express two different shades of meaning. There is now a dayes, p. 199; and also a nyghtes, p. 356. In p. 165 stands drynke deepe, where the last word is meant for an Adverb. The adverb abrode (abroad) is here opposed to in doors, a new meaning.

Among the Prepositions we see our common for al þat, p. 360. The for in the sense of ob now follows a Substantive as well as a verb; surgiens for synnes. In p. 137 stands bi ouht þat ich knowe; in the 'Cursor Mundi' for had been used for this bi. In p. 313 men are at here wittes end.

The Interjections are baw (bah), harow and help! a straw for it! of this Chaucer was fond; the oath by my soule stands in p. 245. The toper's chorus is hoy! trolly! lolly! p. 145; something like the Shakesperian hey, nonny, nonny! especially the first word. How little objection was felt to oaths about 1370 we may learn from the following instance—Piers stands sometimes for Christ, sometimes for the Church, yet the oath by God! is put into his mouth, p. 416.

The Scandinavian words are arate, which in one manuscript is rate (exprobrare), to-luggen (lug to pieces), bustle, cuffe (manica), to by-slober.

The new words, akin to the Dutch and German, are cramp, nip, cough, loll, jog, plot (locus), tawny, galp (yelp), bouken (whence Shakespere's buck basket).

The Celtic words are kick, cobler, tinker, rub, spike, borre (burr) in the throat, cruddes (croddes and creyme, p. 155). The baban of 1220 is now seen as babi.

The poet's birthplace must be fixed somewhere near the Severn; there are a few words that remind us of the Herefordshire poems of 1280, such as tike, capel, gobelyn, momel (mumble), dozen. There is Layamon's gyves, and the Western pouke. The i of the Severn country, inserted before er, is often seen, as cotier, tilier; also þrew (cecidit), asyde, and vauntwarde. There are the Salopian gerls (children), daffe, and garnement.

Among the many French words are boucher (butcher), Jurer, panel, gable, wince, flux, labourer, ague, drugs, morgage, registre, buttress, gill, mange (munch), blammanger, round of bacon, enhabit, lachesse, construe, russet, patent, rave, famine, controller, match (for fire), grammar, to rut, to houpen (our whoop), for mercies sake, pous (pulse), lure, wayves and strayves. We see the Church words provisours, rectour (p. 37), curatour, fraternite, indulgence, meson-dieu; a friar confesses a man, p. 216. Among the lawyers are serjauntes, pat serven atte barre, p. 10. A doctour is a churchman in p. 264, a physician in p. 435. The word gailer, p. 51, is used where prisoner (custos) was employed in the year 1230; the last word had already begun to express a man confined. The word ergo, taken from the Schools, is used for therefore. We hear of puwes (pews) in p. 102. In p. 440 brybour, first appearing in English, is used in the sense of latro, and this sense it bore for two centuries; Littré says that the old French briban (a vagrant) is connected with the Italian birbante. In p. 316 a creature honours his creatour; here the two ways of writing the French ou are found useful; in p. 374 we hear of a comely creature, just as we now say "a fine creature;" Chaucer attached a worse meaning to this word. In p. 262 a beggar is called a povre pyng; this has become one of our commonest phrases. Among the coins, here mentioned, are the noble and the floreyn. The word tutour expresses custos, p. 18, which it long retained in Scotch law. The word gentel seems to undergo the same change that it did in Barbour; we hear of Job the gentel, p. 231; still further, gentiles are opposed to Jews in p. 315. The French cachier was henceforth, as a general rule, to be set apart for capere, and was not to express abigere; this last was to be expressed by the other form chacier (chase). In p. 356 the catch fire of the 'Ancren Riwe' is repeated; one manuscript alters the Teutonic lacchen (capere) into the French cacchen, p. 272; I have no doubt the two words were often confounded. A person is conged in p. 71; the word congé has been revived in later times. The Romance passed imitates the Teutonic ago; he said, seven zer passed, p. 12. We saw, in the year 1290, a doseyn of doggen; the idiom changes in p. 73; a dosene capones; so a payre gloves, p. 109. The Teutonic and Romance are yoked in one word, doblefold, p. 176 ; also parcelmele (our piecemeal), p. 47 ; apartie (apart) stands in p. 263 like the around of 1300. The French maner appears in a Participle, p. 192 ; a wel y-manered mayde ; this must, in our day, always have an Adverb before it. The word seems to have been made a verb in England earlier than in France. In p. 112 we hear of an errant usurer, the source of Barclay's variation arrant ; in p. 167 stands poure pacientes (sufferers). The town Lucca becomes Lukes, p. 81. But Latin forms, in matters religious, supplant their French descendants ; thus we find restitucion, excite, baptism, corps, simile. We see the verb alay in p. 311, where we should now write alloy ; the two forms of spelling this word are still used in two different senses. In p. 116 a man is named nompeyr (umpire) ; the n was docked fourscore years later ; this is just the contrary to what took place in forming the nonce. There is a strange form juvente for youth. The proportion of French words is sometimes very large, as “ He passede forth pacientliche to perpetuel blisse (p. 211).

 Astronomyens al day in here art failen (p. 312).
 And þow penaunce and passioun and parfyt byleyve (p. 323).
 Matrimonye, a moiste frut, þat multipliþ þe peple (p. 333).
 Adjectif and substantyf unite asken,
 Accordaunce in kynde, in cas, and in numbre ” (p. 60).

There is a reference to the hangman of Tyborne, p. 115 ; to rimes of Robyn Hode, p. 121 ; to the flitch of Done-mowe, p. 193 ; to the preaching at St. Paul's, p. 264 ; to the Arches (court), p. 433. Wicked men in holy orders are compared, in p. 311, to bad money with the King's stamp upon it ; Burns has a similar idea, applied to good men, “ the gowd for a' that.” We have a Shakesperian phrase in 203, cast out both lyne and leuell.

No English verse had as yet reached such a height of sublimity as the Passus xxi. of this poem, treating of Christ's death and descent into hell. The bard here, strong in the old national Alliteration, soars above Chaucer, and above every other English writer for the next 200 years. The aforesaid subject had already given birth to some of the very best lines in the ‘Cursor

Mundi ;' English literature, from first to last, owes much to religion.

Much about the same time that the second edition of 'Piers Ploughman' was given to the world, a Canon of Lilleshall in Shropshire, named Mirk (Early English Text Society), drew up a rimed code of instructions for parish priests. We have it in a copy made about sixty years later ; the obsolete Teutonic and the French seem to belong to about the year 1380 ; there are such old forms as syngen (peccare) and forme (primus). We have the same mixture of Northern and Southern forms, so often remarked on before ; heo and scho, beth and are, thilke and that ; also such marked Salopian forms as uche (quisque) and fer (ignis). The last syllable of the curious whatskyn (quicunque, p. 7), seems a compromise between the so of the South and the kin of the North, tacked on to the what.

The gh replaces the older h ; we find dogh (dough), and eghþe (octavus), where Manning had written eightþe, the Old English eahtoþa. The n is inserted in passyngere, p. 26.

There are new Substantives like housebreker, hodymoke, the parent of huggermugger, that is, something hidden ; huyde hyt not in hodymoke, p. 62. We see the noun lychwake, p. 45, for the first time, the word so beloved by the Laird of Monkbarne ; the Old English word for undertaker was licmann. The word attercoppe (aranea), which was written at full length in Norfolk sixty years later, is cut down to coppe, p. 59, whence comes our cobweb. There is the curious holy hallowes in p. 23 ; here the Substantive keeps the old vowel, while in the Adjective it is changed into o ; the two words have become so changed in form that a pleonasm is the upshot. The old ancre of 1300 now becomes ankeras (nun, p. 41), taking the ess that was now fast becoming naturalised in England. There is a curious instance of the double Genitive in p. 23 ; Seynt Mary, Goddes moder of hevene.

As to Adjectives, in p. 7 we hear of an odde weddyng, that is, irregular, much as in Lancashire the word had expressed our exceptional ; an odd child (nothus) is still a Yorkshire phrase. We see a mark of the Severn country when fell adds the sense of callidus to its old meaning crudelis; sleggh and fel, p. 46; here the Latin acer seems to be the connecting link. From the old pic is formed the Adjective pyked, p. 2; applied to shoes that end in a peak. We hear that men ought to kneel to the Host in the road, fayre ne fowle; a terse alliteration, where be the weather is dropped, p. 10.

Among the Pronouns whyche still keeps its true old meaning qualis, p. 1. In p. 21 a priest burns þat (those) ylke same bondes; a curious instance of the Old and the New words for idem being yoked together. We saw at alle in the Salopian poem of 1350; we now, in p. 56, have by non oper way at al.

As to Verbs, need is now followed by an Accusative, heo nedeth lore, p. 28. We are reminded of the cut of a coat in p. 2; a priest is forbidden to wear cuttede clothes. There were two Old English verbs, beorgan (tueri) and borgian (mutuari); the former, corrupted into borwe, had been much used down to this time; henceforward it gave place, at least in the South, to the latter verb, our borrow, as in p. 32. The old folowe (baptizare) was now going out, to be replaced by crystene, as in pp. 5, 18; the latter had been used before the Conquest. The phrase aske the banns stands in p. 7.

Among the Adverbs we find welyngly (voluntariè), found also in Chaucer; this of old had been willeliche in the South. The Preposition for seems in p. 31 to get the sense of against or until; leve bysynes for apon þe werkeday. The source of many new Interjections is to be found in the following lines:—

“Hast þou be wonet to swere als,
By goddes bones or herte, fals,
What by hys woundes, nayles, or tre” (p. 30).

We see the new Romance words sylabul, howsynge (horse-trappings), quart. In p. 23 depart is used both for abire and separare. We find “they prokereth a person to be famed,” p. 22; we have now confounded this Celtic word with the Latin procure, which had come in eighty years earlier.

The old noun syse is used for measure, p. 39; hence our to size men, on parade. We read of the game bares, our prison bars, or prisoner's base. The curatour of 'Piers Ploughman' is again used for parish priest. Some of the reverend gentlemen used sory laten, as Mirk says, when baptizing; thus, I folowe þe in nomina patria & filia spiritus sanctia, Amen, p. 18; so long as the first syllable of the words is right, the baptism is to stand good. Confirmation, he tells us,

"In lewde mennes menyng
Is i-called þe byspyng" (p. 20).

This verb bishop had already been used by Shoreham. Those interested in the Sabbath question will fasten upon the following lines, showing the usage of Wat Tyler's time:—

"Hast þow holden þyn haliday
And spend hyt wel to Goddes pay?
Hast þou any werke þat day i-wroȝt,
Or synned sore in dede or þoȝt?"

For schotyng, for wrastelyng, & oþer play,
For goyng to þe ale on halyday,
For syngyng, for roytyng, & syche fare þat ofte þe sowle doth myche care.

þefore þey schule here halyday
Spene only God to pay.
And ȝef þey do any oþer þyng, þen serve God by here cunnyng, þen þey brekeþ Goddes lay
And holdeþ not here halyday."

There are some pieces in the 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ' which seem to belong to 1380; these are in I. 38, 51, and 59. Manning's old verb rank is now altered to ranche, with the usual insertion of the l, p. 52. There are the new nouns sponful, seel skin, marigolde. The verb riddle (cribrare) is used in a new sense, p. 41, rydelid gownes; hence, to riddle with shot. There is the new verb pampe (pamper), and the curious verb gorwound, p. 55, coming from gar (jaculum); by 1525 this verb was to be shortened into gore. The French verbs are tenche, suet, unordynate. There is spicer, which has become one of our proper names.

Among articles of ladies' dress, named in p. 41, are jacks (jackets) and crakowis. The French is still counted the language of leechcraft, for side-ache here appears as mal de flauinke in p. 52, the first appearance, I think, of flank in English. One of the sins of nuns about this time was undertaking to teach curtesie to their boarders, the sons and daughters of lords, thus throwing aside God's service for pride and luxury; see p. 42.

We may here consider that version of the 'Cursor Mundi' which goes by the name of the 'Cotton Galba' (Early English Text Society). It is a Northern work; in p. 1569 comes a byword, afterwards repeated in Scott's 'Waverley,' gangand fote ay getes fode. Such words as nithing and unnayt appear, I think, for the last time; there are also formfader, rose (jactatio), which are not often found after 1380. The old maineath (perjury) is fairly well spelt in p. 1543; in p. 1575 it is corrupted into mani ath. Among the words dropped in the North since 1290 are to weird (destine), bemester; quatkin ping is turned into any thing, p. 1533; do him understand becomes mak him to understand in p. 1562. Many old words, found in Lancashire and Salop in 1350, are now dropped, such as witherwin, selcuth, last (culpa), mele (loqui); a man is no longer grathed to a state, but is ordained to it, p. 1562.

There are some pieces in the First volume of Hazlitt's 'Early Popular Poetry' which may date from 1380; they are due to the North and the Midland. In the amusing 'Debate of the Carpenter's Tools' we find th' all the short for thou will, p. 79; this process was to be carried very far 200 years later; the morwe now becomes morow (cras), p. 81; there is the Northern hayle (trahere), not the Southern haul. There is the Substantive alewife; the word gyn is used as a snare for animals, p. 15. A man, an admirer of high spirits, wishes to know if his guest be any felow (vir), p. 25; we still say, "not half a fellow." In p. 83 crow is used for a tool, not for a bird; it is our crowbar. In p. 86 a person thinkes no synne to go to the alehouse. There is the phrase thorow thyke and thin, p.

15, used later by Chaucer. In p. 24 fresh is opposed to salt meat; there is unhappy (unlucky), p. 81. A man asks how fer may it be to a town, p. 19, a new phrase; there is also take cold, p. 88. There is the adverb soft, p. 83, standing by itself; it here stands for stop! The ne is coupled with yet before an Imperative in p. 89, expressing moreover, do not, etc. There is the phrase by ought that I canne se, p. 89.

There are the Danish words stykke (steak), wimble, and thimble; these pieces belong to the Danelagh.

The Romance words are servisable, flecher (arrow-trimmer), prentys, fraud, gouge, rule, plane (carpenter's tools), polyff (pulley). In p. 45 and p. 83 stands the verb forteyn (fortune, in the sense of accidere), a verb which Tyndale loved, but was unable to hand down to us. There is the new verb cheer, used also by Wickliffe. The adjective clere is employed in a new sense; twenty merke (marks) clere, p. 81. In p. 83 crewyll (cruel) is used to express acer, as it is still sometimes used in our day. The noun mene (via) appears in p. 84; we now often make it Plural. In p. 85 stands reule the roste. In p. 88 we light upon a startling change, the day is vary longe; here is the adverb that was to supplant swith (valdé), which did not long survive 1400. In p. 43 wives use the baskefysyke; this unusual word, I suspect, means stuprum; in Wickliffe's works (Early English Text Society), p. 157, stands base fisik, used in the same sense; the term was so uncommon that the earliest copyists of the Reformer's works did not understand it, and wrote base instead of basc.¹ In p. 80 stands the proverb:—

The poem on Sir Cleges (Weber, i. 331) may date from about 1380; it has Wickliffe's new gladsum, replacing the old glæddic. There is a curious new idiom, formed upon the they had lever (potius), of 1300; thowe haddyst be better have gold, p. 349; here the Dative thee makes way for a Nominative; the English for est mihi and habeo are confused. The pronoun is dropped in hast no tonge? p. 345. In p. 339 we have what may this be? we now substitute can for may. Men do not slink away, but slake away, p. 334. We have neweltè for novelty, to content him, make pressynge (to press forward).

England had the honour of giving birth to one of the two great poets of the Middle Ages,—of the two bright stars that enlighten the darksome gap of fourteen hundred years between Juvenal and Ariosto. Dante had been at work upon the loftiest part of his ‘Divina Commedia’ at the precise time that Manning was compiling his ‘Handlyng Synne,’ the first thoroughly-formed pattern of the New English; the great Italian was now to be followed by a Northern admirer, of a somewhat lower order of genius indeed, but still a bard who ranks very high among poets of the second class. Chaucer was born in London, a city that boasts a more tuneful brood than any single spot in the world; for this early bard was to have for his fellow-townsmen Spenser, Milton, Pope, and Byron. Never has English life been painted in more glowing hues than by Chaucer; his lines will be more long-lived than the frescoes of Orcagna, which are dropping off the Pisan cloister; though poet and painter belong to the same date.

We see in Chaucer’s many works the remnants of the old Southern dialect, long spoken at London; there are forms like axe (rogare), her, hem, doughtren, ne, nis, nas, thilke, I wil be your, mochel, suster, honde, olde, ashen (cinères), ago, o (unus), awaketh (the Imperative addressed to a person). There is also the Prefix to the Past Participle, as y-bete, y-ronnen. On the other hand there are many forms and phrases that have by this time come down from the North, such as thei han, arn, she (not heo), those (most seldom), holly (omnino), by and by, to and fro, sware, unto, until, highte (altitudo), grub (fodere), lad, fulli, sin (as well as sith), in as much, onward, what ails him to, etc., who was who, snib, take upon him to, etc., take to me (hærerere), I trow, it may wel be, see thou do it, give away, lern (docere), God forbid! folkes (homines), kind (benignus), still (toujours), clad, till, gate (via), whilom, not, doest, latter, begonnest, he which that (this is very common), for ought that, for the nones, homli, I say, fall to it, plow (not sulh), if so be that, if that, blade (lamina), rush (ruere), no force (no matter), as for, using to stele, I am used to blow, carle, loth (inivitus), governinges, dreminges, chastising, wont, felaw of youres, pour, farewel, curate, mistake me, entirely (thoroughly), behalf, stour, stand in stede, being (essentia), blunder, she-wolf. The Northern bird (avis) sometimes supplants the old brid. The verb take is driving out nim. Several forms from the Severn country had by this time made their way to London, such as that made he with the best, aside, upsodoun, wele or wo, bowyer, make it queint, lady mine, ones on a time, how now, be at on, at large, for all the world, son in law, badder, touching this, swiche as it is, harry (trahere), houp (clamare). The old seith as muchel ase of the 'Hali Meidenhad' now becomes as much to sayn as. The word knave, as in Lancashire, becomes a term of abuse; indeed, many Lancashire phrases of 1360 may be found in Chaucer. His poems seem to have a range of about thirty-five years. So popular was he that some of his works were turned into the Northern dialect, thus reversing the usual order of things; in one manuscript we see bather (amborum), and fae (hostis).

I now consider Chaucer's poems continuously. I begin with one of his earliest works, that on the 'Death of Blanche the Duchess' (Chaucer Society, part ii. 213). We see the owe supplant e; pyle becomes pylowe, p. 220. In p. 223 the French à la bonne heure (I am glad to hear it) seems to be Englished by yn good tyme. In p. 239 a certain lady's symple recorde (tale) is said to be trew as any bonde; the first use of the noun for a legal document. In the same page stands trewar-tongyd; here the Comparative is used in compounds; we have already seen hard-hearted. In p. 217 streams make a dedly slepyngge soun; hence "a dead sleep." Chaucer is fond of adding ish to an adjective; we see here fattyssh, also fleshy, p. 239. He uses the Northern werre (pejor) for the sake of the rime, p. 230. In p. 236 the Duchess is called my swete right all hirselve, that is, she was distinguished from all others; our sense of he was all himself is rather different. Another use of all is seen in body, herte, and all, p. 216; this did not become common until Tyndale's time. About the year 1300 we heard of ane fewe fullaris; the first word, representing the Plural soli, now means quidam; a few wellys, p. 217. In p. 226 the poet stands as styll as ought (anything), a new phrase. In p. 241 we read of a half worde, used for purposes of trickery. Among the Verbs are have the witte to, etc., sing low and high, overshoot him (run beyond him), play a game, well grounded, hit folwyd (followed) that she was, etc., to hang the hed, put it yn ryme. Among the Adverbs is full, employed in full many a yer, p. 249. The no and nay are used in the middle of a sentence; no man could do it, no, not Joseph, p. 221, your eyen, myn, nay, all that saw her, p. 242. There is the phrase swear as I beste koude, p. 247. The les is added to dred to express sine dubio, p. 234; and dredles paved the way for doutles, which we still use as an Adverb. The old on þam gerad þæt makes way for the new up (upon) a condicyoun that, etc., p. 234. There is the cry O howe! (oho!) to awaken sleepers, p. 218. There is the new oath by the masse, p. 239; this lasted into the Eighteenth Century. The adjuration, as help me God! comes often.

There is the Celtic knack (trick), p. 242, used also by Wickliffe.

Among the Romance words are nyctety (stultitia), mate, powne (pawn), porte (carriage), vary, annex, process of time, herse, assured maner, governess, astate (dignity), as in Barbour. A new French preposition was coming into our compounds; we see the verb countrefete. The verb carole adds the meaning of canere to its old sense saltare, p. 236. The word patrone takes the new sense of exemplar, p. 238; we now write it pattern; superior must be the connecting link between the two meanings borne by patrone. There is the phrase to save (attend heedfully to) hir wurshipe; hence our "save a horse up a hill." How entirely a word's meaning may be altered appears in p. 250, where a queynte dream is talked of; here the old cognitus, cuint, queynte gets the opposite sense of incognitus, something strange or out of the way. So the Teutonic seli (felix) had shifted its meaning to infelix. The Romance purely now imitates the Old English cloene, meaning omnino, p. 215. In p. 218 stands a quater bifore daye (a quarter of an hour); here there is a great ellipse. In p. 220 we hear of satyn de owter mere; French could alone express certain articles of lady's dress. We find the noun entewn, p. 221, our tune; we have this variation of the French as well as tone. In p. 238 dyskryve expresses videre, our descry; the French had both descrivere and the later descrire. We hear of Spreuse (Prussia) in p. 241; the prefixing of s is most curious. In p. 246 yn the dysmall appears; this has been derived from disme and the payment of tithes, a time of sorrow; see Skeat on this point.

I now take some of the other earliest efforts of Chaucer's genius, the 'Parliament of Fowls,' the 'A B C,' and 'Anelida and Arcite.'¹

We see k replace ch, as in the North; lykerous for lecherous; the f is mistaken for long s, as flight (sleight) and flaterie, p. 154. The word feling is now applied to the mind, not to the body. A dame holds her lover in strict subjection; it is said that he is sarvant unto hir ladishippe (power), p. 160; hence came the title of honour. A person's colour is said to resemble that of asshen (ashes). A lover, seeing a lady, cladde him in her huwe (wore her colours), p. 156. We hear of watir foule, and of Seynt Valentynes day, when birds choose their mates. Old phrases were going out; soule hele is altered into soules helthe in one manuscript. Among the Adjectives we find our seamen's phrase, the northe northe west, p. 58. The Teutonic hard is confused with the French hardi; the hardy asshe (tree), p. 62. The Adjective hust (whist) stands for tacitus, p. 174. Among the Verbs are give it up (cease from it), take accion, hear of no mercy; this last phrase we always use in the negative. Fowls lay their heads togedir, p. 88. The English for vellem is dropped in rapere dye than to do so, p. 166. Another verb is dropped in but to the poynte, p. 76. As to Adverbs, the so is used something like valdè; a yere ys not so long to endure, p. 96. In p. 168 stands the phrase, say oute of the way (odd). The by is used in a new sense; it had often been used after the verb know; we now see in p. 50 I mene this be love. In p. 134 we have fals to him. Chaucer is fond of a phrase like flour of alle flour, p. 124.

There is the Scandinavian word scant (parcus), p. 134.

Among the French words are cormeraunte, entrike (ensnare), roundel, portray, princess, governouresse, superlatyf, lese (leash), nusance, tryumphe, laurer (laurel), to corect (writing), disshewe, p. 66. In p. 58 we hear first of a dedely wound, then of a mortale stroke. A verb is formed from the Teutonic crampe (spasmus); and this takes the French ish at the end, p. 158. Arrow heads are tempred in water, p. 64, a new use of the verb. In p. 90 a lady may be strainge to her lover; that is, unfriendly. There is the new phrase good feith, p. 175. We see the expressions receyve unto mercy, to absente you, have no fantesye to debate, p. 175; here the first noun takes the new meaning of liking. The adjective pleyne, in p. 154, signifies frank, open; hence the Plaindealer. A lover has awaytinges and besynesse (care) upon his lady, p. 164; here the idea of attendance or service first comes into the word wait. In p. 142 St. John is called a virgyne; a new use of the word. The old sotell and the new Latin form subtil may be seen struggling together in the manuscripts; see p. 152.

We now turn to the two poems written in the middle of Chaucer's life—the 'Troilus' and the 'House of Fame.'¹ The former is interesting as being the first work in which we trace the influence of the New Italian upon English; Boccaccio's 'Filostrato' supplied our own bard with many ideas.

In the first stanza of this work the sound of oy seems to undergo a change; for Troye and joye are made to rime with fro ye (from you). The r is struck out; mæscere (mesh) gives birth to the verb mask, p. 167. Among the Substantives are trapdore, twiste, overhaste, unrest, a blab, crowis feet (under the eye). We have already seen ladyship; a man is now requested to do something of your lordship, p. 91, like "of your charity." There is a new compound, a let-game, p. 124, like our marplot. The word selynesse keeps its old sense of felicity in p. 134. The old leaf makes way for love (amans), p. 244 ; folk see their loves wedded. Instruments are sometimes delicious through wynde, p. 248. A woman tells prophecies by herte, p. 286 ; a new phrase. An Old English usage is continued when Troie toun is spoken of, p. 268. Chaucer is fond of adding ess to nouns ; as herdess (shepherdess). In the 25th stanza the heroine is said to be matchless, just as A is our first letter ; this is the first hint of our "A one."

Among the new Adjectives are thrifty, unholsum, womanish ; this last was formerly wifmanlic. Chaucer is fond of the ending ish ; he coins mannysh in stanza 41, to express the reverse of womanly perfection. He also adds this ish to the French adjective fole, making folish. He has the Superlative konnyngeest. There is the phrase a lame word in p. 41 ; whence our lame excuse. A prosperous man, in p. 163, is said to sit warme ; hence our warm (thriving) man, and our tenants sit at so much rent. A lady promises her friend my good wurde, p. 271. There are the phrases streight as lyne, in short. The Adjective is set after the Vocative, as uncle dere, lady bright ; it is made a Substantive, for in p. 204 flatte is opposed to egge (edge).

As to Pronouns, a lover is said to have it hot, p. 164, 192 ; here the indefinite it, referring to nothing before, reappears. Chaucer is fond of this or that. He revives a French idiom unknown since 1220 ; fox þat 3e ben ! p. 161. The half is now placed before an accusative ; make halvendel þe fare, p. 244.

Among the Verbs are unsitting (soon to become unfitting), mutter, to biblotte (blot), humme, unlove, forecast, unpin. There are the phrases, they fell to speak, it fell that (accidit), set at rest, to sand paths, dy for laghtir, fever takes him, hold thee clos (keep close), douncast look, make up charters, welc yshape (well shaped, of a lady), reise þe country, fold armes, set the world at six & seven, p. 193 ; his herte mysforyaff him, p. 222, (the later misgave), dwell oute caste from joy, bring out a word, make resistence, drave his breeþ, yve him audience, fynd in thyn herte to, etc. The verb mean is in great use, as the explanatory I mean, p. 122 ; he menith it in good wise, p.

66; þow menynt wele, p. 117. We have already seen play king in 1300; a the is now inserted; pley þe tiraunt, p. 85. Chaucer preserves the old form lorne (perditus). In p. 291 stands he went excusing her; we should now put in on after the perfect. The to is now set between dare and the following Infinitive (a strange corruption), dare to love; there is also sworn to hold it. We see the curious phrase in stanza 48, your hire is quit, God wot how. In stanza 41 a lady's limbs answer to womanhood; here the verb gets a new meaning, "be consistent with."

Among the Adverbs are, unfelingli, out and out þe worthiest, p. 67; parfourme it out; inly. There is the terse phrase, to save his lyf and ellis not, p. 61, where the last two words mean, "which is otherwise impossible." An adjective is used for an adverb, take it faire and softe, p. 244; here the last words slip into the meaning of quietly. The at next is cut down in p. 283, when ye nexte see upon me.

As to Prepositions, we find arme in arme, wiþ al myn hert, for oght I can aspye, I speke under correction, at þe werste, what they wold sey to it (de eo). This to is sometimes dropped; in p. 279 we see both write to hir and also write hir. The phrase for God's love becomes for love of God, p. 173; we confine the older idiom to sake. A lady's attendants are called women about her, p. 129; implying respectful attendance, a new use of the Preposition. Chaucer has overrenne (beat in running), p. 223; this in his later works he altered into outrun.

There is the Low German noun lash, and also roore (tumultus), whence our later uproar. There is the Scandinavian verb jompre, our jumble.

Among the Romance words are collateral, a pacient (of a physician), misconstrue, lytargie (lethargy), is descended from, wele disposyd (inclined), chekmate, guerdon, in mewe (prison), scarmyssh, tendre herted, impressions (thoughts), prolixite, to plye him, sentement, dissimule, templys (tempora), our desertis, source, mocyon, rudeness, vulgarly, marciall (martial), cote armure, urne, rosy, my memorie. There are the phrases press him upon her, make his adew, direct a book to. The cry, mea culpa, stands in p. 59, a foretaste of the many Latin phrases that were to be brought into English about 1550. There is the noun refrein (burden of a song, p. 97); this has been revived in our day. We see the phrase pley rakett to and fro, p. 187; the noun has lately become very popular. The name Pandarus is contracted into the ill-omened Pandar to suit the rime, p. 272. The word passion no longer means suffering, but is applied to emotions, p. 196. In p. 213 we hear of a pregnant argument (forcible or constraining). Littré gives no use of the adjective used in this sense in France, until the Sixteenth Century; it is odd that in England the word should make its first appearance with this secondary meaning. The old folcisc is supplanted by poeplyssh, our vulgar and base, p. 231. A Greek hero loses the last consonant in his name, as Diomedé. In p. 236 straunge stands for mirus, a new sense; uncouth has assumed senses something like strange. We have already seen trewar tongyd; the Superlative now comes into compounds, for strengest feybed stands in stanza 143. In p. 258 we hear of tyme passed, present tyme, and future tyme. The form recomaunde (recommend) stands in p. 283, riming with comaunde.

We see certain proverbs, as, of harmys two þe lasse is for to chese, p. 58; every þing a byggunyng hath, p. 65; hit is not good a slepyng hound to wake, p. 132; al þing haþ tyme, p. 135; make vertu of necessite, p. 227; wonder laste but IX nyghtes in a toun, p. 192. Chaucer had sound notions of language;

“ Ye know wel þis, in fourme of speche is chaunge
 Withyn a thowsand ȝeer, and wordis tho
 That haddyn pris now wondur nyce & straunge
 Us þinkip hem ” (p. 42).

Chaucer's 'House of Fame' must have been written soon after his 'Troilus.' There are here the Northern phrases how that, woful, alleskynnes (all kinds of), pel (castellum), as now. The d replaces þ, as quod he (dixit), a form copied long afterwards by More. The s is inserted in sterisman, and the old wealhnute (walnut) becomes walsh note, p. 216.

Among the new Substantives are huntress, potful. There is the phrase to bere it was no game (joke), p. 221. The Sun's chariot is still called a carte, p. 206. The word spryng is used for a dance in p. 215; and there we also see, in one manuscript, hove daunce (court dance), connected with German musicians; this strange word is elsewhere altered into love daunce; Gower also uses this German hove. There is a curious new idiom of the Double Genitive in p. 222; Englishmen before this time had talked of the king's son of France; but we now see the God of loves name; this comes very sparingly in the next forty years. A house is said to be full of gyges, p. 234, whence our whirligig, seemingly meaning the same. Chaucer's favourite ish is employed in the adjective Troianysshe, not Trojan, p. 185. He further has grenysshe, p. 226; the first combination of ish, I think, with adjectives of colour. There is the phrase so swyft as thought, p. 234. In p. 217 stands alle and every man of hem. In p. 230 stands wostow whatte (do you know what?); I tell you what (aliquid) was to come in Shakespere. In p. 240 men say I not (nescio) never what, a new phrase. The what (aliquid) is repeated in p. 238; I herde thinges, what a loude and what in ere; hence our "what with A and what with B." There is our curious Interrogative idiom, what did Eolus but he toke out hys trumpe, p. 226. We see a new phrase for quidam; oon I koude nevene (name), p. 196.

Among Verbs we find my hert betes, take goode herte, do you favour, wot how I stonde. In p. 218 the Goddess is y-stalled; I suspect this form led to our installed. There is a curious new idiom of the Subjunctive, dreme he barefote, dreme he shod, p. 183, like the later come weal, come woe. The verb ken had hitherto stood for scire; it now means videre in p. 194; kenne with myn ye (eye); a kenning in this sense was soon to become a sea term. The old chop (secare) gets the new meaning of ferire, p. 231; that of mutare was to come later. The verb start now becomes transitive; stert an hare, p. 199. There is the new verb humble (sonare), formed from the sound, p. 209; in Scotland a certain waterfall is known as the Hummel Bummel. The verb lilt appears in connection with music, a liltyng horne, p. 214. The preposition for now replaces after; to go for Eolus (to bring him), p. 224. The interjection a is now used before nouns, a larges, larges! p. 217; it was soon to precede the names of knights as a war cry.

Among the Romance words are signal, soar, casually, feminine, sicamour, oracle, sisoures (scissors), the contraryes, conservatyf, p. 204; palpable, fumigacions, saturnyne, at poynt devys, Galaxy, agreable, is perched, pouch, curroure (courier), to entremedle, to acheke (check). We see the new French jowes, our jaws, p. 230; this was doubtless confounded with the old Teutonic ceast, choule, jowl. The verb wayte (expectare) seems to get the new sense of morari; love may last a season, but wayte upon the conclusyon, p. 189. In p. 199 a man has devocion to Cupido, a new phrase. The word poetry was something new; it stands for poema in p. 221; it is used in our present sense, p. 204. In p. 206 we read of eyryssh bestes (air-dwelling animals); perhaps our adjective eerie may come from this. There is the phrase no fors (no matter), p. 208; this lasted for 150 years. In p. 235 we hear of dearth, fire, and of divers accident; here the word seems to slide into the sense of mischance. We read of a pelet out of goune, and also of the poudre, that produces the effect, p. 226. In p. 239 a goddess confers names after her disposicioun; here the word may mean either will or order. Chaucer is fond of using see (sedes) for a throne, but this did not take root. We see unfamousse, p. 212 (unknown to fame), very different from our infamous. There is the noun pursevant (pursuivant), p. 217; here the v may perhaps have taken the place of a u, as in pursuer. In p. 227 easy is opposed to fast; hence our "easy all!"

In p. 187 comes the proverb hyt is not al golde that glareth. In p. 217 the victim flayed by Apollo appears as Marcia, a lady.

We now come to the 'Canterbury Tales,' compiled in the fulness of Chaucer's powers.¹ As to Vowels, a replaces æ, as bladder and rafter for blædre and ræfter; before this time these had been written bleddre and refter; the a replaces e, as bramble for bremble; the a replaces ea, for mearh (medulla) gives rise to the form marie bones; the a replaces eo, as hart for heort (cervus), which had before been hert. The ai replaces æ, as hair for hær; praiere comes instead of preiere. The French ai becomes ia in fustian (fustaine); Chaucer makes it a word of three syllables, ii. 3. The e replaces i, as sleke for the old slike (lævis), and disc now splits up into two forms, desk and dish. The e replaces o, as yeman for the Northern yoman; it replaces y, as shelf for scylfe, werde (fatum) for wyrd. The Kentish forms mery and bery (sepelire) are adopted by Chaucer; but he has mirth as well as merthe; also filthe and sippe, not the Southern fulthe and supe. Three variations of vowels were still striving for the mastery in London, for we find in Chaucer brustles, bristles, berstles, all three. The former leien, the Past Participle of lie (jacere), is now written lien, the form kept in our Prayer Book; the ie is the Kentish way of sounding the French ê; the i replaces e, for there is divel for devil, as in Ireland; it replaces o, for parosche becomes parishe. The old oreisun becomes orison, iii. 204, with the accent on the first vowel. Chaucer turns the old akern into acorn; he is fond of doubling the o, as in mood, flood, cook; he uses the two forms, corone and croune; he turns y into o, as copper for the old cyperen. The form oi might be sounded either as the French ou or as the French ê, thus we see the noun devoir from debere; this was soon to be written by Englishmen as both devure and dever. The ow replaces a g or 3; wilig (salix) is written wilwe and also wilow; belg (follis) is seen as belous (bellows); the word had taken the Plural form ninety years earlier. The Past Participle of sowen (serere) is here y-sowe; the Participle of seowen (suere) is here sewed. We have now confounded these two Verbs, answering in sound to the French sou and siou, and we have further made the Weak seowen a Strong Verb, as regards the Past Participle. What was usually written roll is now roule; we see both flood and floud; the old ule (bubo) becomes owle, not changing its sound. The form oi, not ui, seems to be favoured; Shoreham's annoie is repeated; this verb, iii. 323, implies sheer boredom, and is nearer to the modern ennui than to annoyance. Chaucer adopts the forms fruit and guise. The oy was now becoming a favourite combination in France;

so he has, not only real and rial, but also royal. He has both beauté and beuté, the French and English forms of one sound. The tree iw, ew, is now written ew, our yew. The French word for debitus appears as dewe, ii. 91, but it takes the Gloucester form due, ii. 280; there is also dutee; we have insisted on changing the French sound ou into the thoroughly English iou (ew). We see yonge Hew of Lincoln, not the older form Huwe. We find in Chaucer our national habit of contracting; we get rid of the sound of vowels; soverainetee, ii. 198, is sounded like sovrantee. We have the line in ii. 200—

“That litel wonder is though I walwe and wind.”

Here the e in wonder and the e in walwe are both dropped. So, a little further on, in p. 203—

“Poverte a spectakel is, as thinketh me.”

Here both the e in poverte and the last e in spectakel drop.

In iii. 57 we have the first hint of it's (est)—

“It is an honour to everich that is here.”

As a general rule, English throws back the accent to the third syllable from the end; so in iii. 233 stands

“That referreth to thy confusion.”

So Achilles and Lucina take the accent on the first syllable. It is the same with batailles, iii. 164.

As to Consonants, Chaucer ruled that we should write tempt instead of the other form of the word tent; this latter had been already bespoken in the North as a form of attend. The b becomes p; kembed is seen as kemped, ii. 64; hence our unkempt. Not only p but f is inserted, for the old forqitol, Gower's foryetel, is now written forgetful. We see the old chirk, not our modern chirp. We find ark, ii. 133, where we should now write arch (arcus). The c is struck out; preswold becomes threswold (threshold). The g is changed into ck and thus forms a new verb; tug gives birth to tuck; a friar is ytucked hie, ii. 220. Chaucer writes gailer for the jailer of Piers Ploughman; we may now write either gaol or jail. The gh is in full force, this being an old London form ; bough is written for boh, with the last consonants probably unsounded ; cough is also found, and draught. We see the form markis, and this pronunciation may still be heard in our day. The d is inserted in hegge, hedge, and in abr ; so alder (alnus), the later elder, appears. The interchange between r and s is seen in the North Western glimèrin, which becomes glimsing, our glimpse, ii. 308. There is the form pace, as well as pass. The old ps is now transposed ; waps becomes wasp. The waves (fluctus) of the Tristrem now become waves, ii. 147, with the usual confusion of u and v.

On turning to Substantives, the foreign ard, ardie, appears in dotard, slogardie. The foreign ry was coming in, as goldsmithry, deiry, yemanrie. The er is freely tacked on, as thou glader of the mount, ii. 66 ; a vertuous liver, ii. 163. The ending ness was encroaching on hed ; shrewedness replaces Shoreham's schreuhede ; there is also homliness, wilfulness. There is both likelihed and likeliness, jolinesse, doubleness, strangeness, scantness. New words are formed by adding man, as court-man (courtier), ii. 281. As to Proper names, jacke fool is used, ii. 110, much like our Tom fool ; hence come jackass and jackanapes. We see the names Simkin, Hodge, Mabily ; the prison of Newgate has become proverbial, ii. 132. We light upon Jubaltare (Gibraltar). The es is no longer tacked on to a Latin word to form the Genitive, like the old Juliuses ; we see Philippus sone applied to Alexander, iii. 172. We see cokenay already employed as a term of reproach, ii. 125. The word ship becomes feminine ; and this, in our days, is the gender of a man of war. On the other hand, the month of May is masculine, iii. 8. The Verbal Nouns are freely used ; spending silver, iii. 231 ; gon a begging, iii. 28 ; his helping stands for his help (service), ii. 82 ; so my willing (voluntas), ii. 246 ; to my supposing, ii. 268. The Prepositions are set after Nouns, in phrases like a bringer out of besinesse, the bilding up of chirches, as we saw in earlier writers. The word forfex is translated by the Plural sheres, not by the Singular, ii. 189. Right also takes a plural ; have your rights, ii. 286. In ii. 128 we hear of two pigges in a poke. In ii. 214 min owen boy is used as a term of endearment. The word pley is now used for a theatrical piece. The French ecu, a piece of money, is Englished by sheld. There are new Substantives like outrider, thwittle (whittle), meremaiden (no longer merewif), chip, bever hat, baggepipe, wallet, breſtplate, twinkling of an eye, hertes eſe, night-cap, goſſomer (goose summer film), milkſop, broun bred, chuk, on his tiptoon, bakemete. The word fane, which earlier meant a streamer, is now used to express our vane. There is shrimp, that is, an object contracted very small, from the old verb scrymman. In iii. 327 every ſinful man is a cherl (ſervus) to ſinne; cherliſh is used for our blackguardly in p. 26. The word monger was coming in, tacked on to other nouns, as queſtmonger. The French age is added on to cot; the word cotin was used for our cottage to the South of the Channel. The word purhfaru had of old meant camera; it now takes our ſenſe of the word, and appears as thurghfare. The term girles is used for puellæ, ii. 20, and not in the Weſt country ſenſe of children. The old hlædel (a pump) is used for a cook's ladle, p. 60. The Old Engliſh mære-fæc now becomes the nightes mare (nightmare). The old lenten, as in Treviſa, was making way for a new term; in iii. 13 we hear of the ſpring flood. The old crop now takes a new ſenſe—that of ſeges. The word tun is used, not for dolium, as uſual, but to expreſs a meaſure; tonne-gret, ii. 60. The old zerde (virga) alſo expreſſes a meaſure; ſomething is a zerde long. We read of the pipes of a man's lungs, ii. 82. A perſon does not take in boarders, but holds gueſts to borde, ii. 95. In ſtand in his light, ii. 101, the laſt word gets a new meaning. Wench is not used by Chaucer in the honourable ſenſe of the North country; in ii. 108 it ſtands for ancilla; it is applied to no one higher than a miller's daughter. Old January's wife ſays,

“I am a gentil woman, and no wenche.”

In iii. 251 we learn that women, high and low alike, may fall a prey to the ſeducer.

“But, for the gentil is in eſtat above,
She ſhal be cleped his lady and his love;

And, for that other is a poure woman,
She shal be cleped his wenche and his lemman."

Chaucer and Dr. Johnson both employed the word aforesaid in the same evil sense. Leman also is sadly degraded from its old meaning, as we see here. The word fit conveyed the notion of certare of old; in ii. 126 the noun stands for nothing so serious, and prepares the way for our fit of coughing, and such like. Our green has long Englished stultus; in ii. 138 we hear of grenehed or folie. There is a change in herbergeour, ii. 162; it no longer means harbourers, but men who go before, our harbingers; this is Barbour's change. The word loller has changed its meaning since Piers Ploughman wrote, and now implies heresy, iii. 59. The old sense of thing (causa) is well marked in iii. 176; a man was slain for no thing but for chivalrie. Adam and Eve are said to have made themselves breches in Paradise, iii. 281, a word which has given a name to one English version of the Bible. There is the usual love of Alliteration in the sentence, all min heritage, toun and tour, ii. 301; there is also hous and home.

Among the Adjectives we find a new use of the Superlative, fairest of the fair, ii. 66, where alre fairest would have been used earlier. The Substantive may be dropped, as thurgh thick and thinne, ii. 121. The word lihtsum (facilis) is formed from another adjective, as gladsum had already been. The les is added to a foreign root, as a tittleles tiraunt, iii. 251. Chaucer is fond of ful as an Adjectival ending; he replaces the old hatelic by hateful. We talk of a horsy man; but Chaucer coined horsly when he wanted an Adjective of this kind. He writes shi sometimes for the old sleh, and uses it in a bad sense; and here he is followed by Gower. There are new Adjectives like coltish, tusked, lernered, dogerel. There is stibborne, said to mean "stiff as a stub." We have phrases like broune as is a bery, to speke brode (plainly), ii. 23 (hence a broad joke); this is the short and plain, ii. 33 (long and short of it); at the leste way (least-ways), ii. 34, have the beter, upright as a bolt, piping hot, besy as bees, a black bill shone as the jet, iii. 181. There is a new Alliterative phrase, the foule fend fetche me, ii. 215. In ii.

208 a promise is made to strike a man out of oure lettres blake; this is the source of our black books. In ii. 249 we hear of wise and ripe wordes; the last adjective, as used in this sense, had now come South. A very long Adjectival phrase is spun in iii. 1, twenty-pound-worth lond. The word sad gets the meaning of tristis, as in the North; in ii. 253 it is applied to sorrowful Grisildis. An Adjective is strengthened by prefixing a Substantive, as bolt upright.

Among the Pronouns we see ye and thou both used in a prayer to God, iii. 7; also in an address to parents, ii. 141; also in a speech to an adored wife, ii. 301. On the other hand, a master uses thou to a pupil, and the pupil addresses the master with ye, iii. 317. In you were nede to resten, iii. 63, the first word is in the Dative, like Shakespere's "you were best go." In ii. 305 stands nis non, no, nouthur he ne she; a Northern form of male and female. In iii. 158 Fortune overthrows hire man; that is, the man on whom she has her eye. We see the old Dative of it very plainly when we read of the Paternoster; it comprehendeth in himself all good, iii. 358. The Indefinite it comes more into vogue; it priketh in my side, that is, "I am pricked," ii. 215; it nedeth not reherse, I wol auntere (adventure) it, ii. 125, like the make it stout (ruffle it) of 1320. The which sometimes keeps its true old meaning, that of the kindred qualis; as, herkeneth whiche a miracle befell, ii. 80; I shal tellen which a gret honour it is to be, etc., ii. 206; this was to be replaced by Barclay's what 120 years later. The which is also used as a Masculine Relative; thise riotoures, of which I tell, iii. 49; also as a Neuter Relative (Gower is fond of this); herd all thing which (he) spake, iii. 221; there is also the Northern the which; also for fere of which, referring to an Antecedent. The what is more used; he told him as ye han herd, ye wot wel what, ii. 233. It is employed in asking about a man's profession; is he a clerk or non? tell what he is, iii. 219. Orrmin's what now encroaches upon the old which (qualis); I have declared what thing is penance, iii. 260. The such is used indefinitely like the French tel; prentices appoint to meet in swiche a strete, ii. 130. In iii. 58 we have the abrupt command, no more of this, with no Verb.

In ii. 182 we get the first hint of our all the same; a man is buried; all is his tomb not so curious as, etc. The word one takes a Plural; herkeneth, felawes, we three ben all ones, ii. 50; a foretaste of little ones. In saw him al alone, ii. 276, the al (all) comes twice over. We now say all right in token of compliance; Chaucer's phrase for this was al ready, Sire, ii. 277. He employs every body, ii. 153. Enough now takes a Genitive; he saw ynou of other folk, ii. 218. The development of any was going on fast; in ii. 319 stands to riden any where; in ii. 296 love him best of any creature; here all creatures would have stood earlier. There is the phrase to rise a ten or twelve, ii. 321; here of the clock is dropped; foure of the clok stands in iii. 256; that is, four strokes of the bell. We saw mare harm is in the year 1220; Chaucer prefixes a the to the more, iii. 251. There is the new way of Englishing the Latin ipse; eke the veray hogges were fered, iii. 197; in copying deeds, about this time, scribes were wont to affirm, "this is the very copy of the grant;" so truthful that it might be taken for the deed itself.

Among the Verbs we see a new idiom, we han ben waytynge, ii. 28; this is an advance on "I am seeking," which dates from the earliest times. We remarked the idiom of the year 1300, "to have the streets empty," where have answers to facere; this have is now followed by the Infinitive as well as by an Adjective; chese to han me foule, . . . and be to you a trewe wif, ii. 203; hence "I would have you go." Chaucer has a startling innovation, wholly unneeded, in the Active Participle, which he perhaps confused with its Passive brother; a swerd yhanging by a thred; Milton most likely had this in his mind when he wrote about "a star-ypointing pyramid." Chaucer has both mot and muste, the old and the new, in one couplet in ii. 295. His may, contrary to old usage, expresses licet rather than possum. The sholde now and then stands for our would, as in ii. 305; but it comes far seldomer than in Caxton; our language was losing some of its weight and gravity in 1390. The can and coude are sometimes used in their old sense of scire. We saw in 1280 an imitation of the French sans aller; our

by now follows in the wake of without ; by having grete possessions, iii. 131. The Infinitive follows bind ; as ybounden to helpe me ; the old boun (paratus) had long been followed by an Infinitive. There are new verbs like caterwaw (of a cat), clottered, munch, jingle, unhorse, prolle (scrutari). The verb get was acquiring a Middle sense ; a man geteth him to drinke, iii. 334 ; this is like Orrmin's take. The Danish forkaste (rejicere) had been used in Kent ; but Chaucer couples fore, not for, with the verb, and talks of something forecaste (devised beforehand). The old snæsen (ferire) now takes the sense of our sneeze, iii. 246 ; this is the Dutch niesen ; the old fnesen still survived. The verb turn is applied to the turner's trade, ii. 117. The verb shape now expresses not only creare, but dirigere ; as in our "shape his course ;" he shope him to lie thilke night, ii. 221. To crak, ii. 292, is used in the Scotch sense of the word, loqui. The verb wreke here retains one of its oldest senses, exercere ; wreke his ire on it, iii. 170 ; it was soon to lose its other meaning of ulcisci and to be replaced by avenge. The expletive I gesse, so much used in America, appears in Chaucer, as in Wickliffe, ii. 303. We have heard before of sworn brethren ; we now see thy boren man, ii. 290. Chaucer has both I schrewe and I beshrewe, formed from the Noun. The old writhe now becomes intransitive ; she writhed away, ii. 98, and it is, moreover, turned into a Weak verb. There are barbarous forms like thou wisted, ii. 35 ; thou wotest, ii. 69. A verb is dropped in the phrase, o word er I go, ii. 223. The verb trip is now coupled with dancing. The verb whine is applied to a horse, ii. 179 ; we now distinguish this sense of the word from its other meaning by writing it whinny. With us, sufferers sing out ; Chaucer makes them only sing, ii. 207. The Imperative come of stands in ii. 215, where Scotsmen would now say, come away, and where Englishmen would say, come along. There are phrases like it tikelith me, yeres ago, have the higher hand, ring it out, take his ese, make tarying, be in praiere, he was bore (borne) down, he was sworne adoun, wel ygrowen, knit his browes, wet hir whistle, speke him fayre, hold compaignie with, let things slide, to set gemmes in gold, have a bad name, do obeisance, do a frendes turn to, have love to thee, the thing is ygon so fer, sail hir cours, drive a bargain, take thy deth, to go to the point, give in charge to, mordre wol out, God blesse my soule, kepe it close, I sette (put) case, put out his eyen, take effect, make all good, to go sorweful, go nigh the sothe, God spede you. The Teutonic and Romance synonyms stand side by side in the line, “This wif was not aferde ne affraide” (iii. 72).

“Right as a swerd forcutteth and forkerveth” (iii. 255).

Among his Adverbs Chaucer employs the Northern where for the dependent ubi, not the old there, iii. 31. Sometimes whereas stands for this ubi, referring to place, as in ii. 210; hwar ase appeared for ubicunque so far back as 1220. This whereas slides into a new meaning in iii. 113, taking the sense of quum; you acted thus, whereas it had ben necessarie to act otherwise. Another shade of meaning, that of quoniam, was to come thirty years later. The as is now, without any need, prefixed to yet (adhuc) and now; no word as yet spake he, ii. 205; maken no defence as now, iii. 130. The that, taking the sense of quia, follows not, as in very early times; lo thin ende, nat only that thou faintest mannes mind, ii. 160. The preposition without is now used to English nisi; without ye list your grace shewe. A case is dropped after a preposition, and the latter consequently seems to become an Adverb; his berd was shave as neighe as he can (nigh the skin), ii. 18. There is belike, ii. 96; for the nones seems to be used as a mere expletive, when the Miller is described as a stout carle for the nones. There are new phrases like right (just) now, as fer as ever I can (know), nay but, ther is more behinde, clap the window to, where the last word is not a Preposition. Chaucer prefixes litel to a Comparative, as litel better. The doutles, like Barbour's dredles, is used as an Adverb, and not as an Adjective, ii. 135. The synonyms wel neigh and the later almost are coupled in one line, ii. 323. Chaucer, when describing a tournament, imparts wonderful spirit to his verse by putting adverbs before the verbs; as in gon the speres, out gon the swerdes, etc. We have already seen mid alle and of alle used for omnino; we now come to the more lasting phrase, spare it not at all, ii. 220; no joye at all, ii. 199, as in Mirk. Beside may mean either the old juxta or the new etiam in the following passage:—

“Not only in the toun,
But eke beside in many a regioun” (ii. 249).

The Adverbial ending is most awkward when added to an Adjective in ly, as Chaucer's comelily. The old other . . . other (aut . . . aut) is now changed for a new form, other (either) conscience or ire, ii. 166. There is a needless insertion of elles in iii. 80, an holy man, as monkes ben, or elles ought to be. We have seen the improper ferther in the Tristram; the old ferrest is now changed into forþest. The new what though is used to English etiamsi, iii. 180. A backbiter is said to praise his neighbour, but still he maketh a “but” at the laste ende, iii. 298; here the but seems to be made a substantive.

Turning to the Prepositions, the to follows Past Participles; chosen therto, ii. 63; borne to thraldom, ii. 141; there is also redy to his hond, ii. 207, like the it lay to hand of the ‘Cursor Mundi.’ The to supplants for in have it to myself alone, iii. 55; it is an honour to everich, iii. 57. The to wille of Layamon's Second text is continued in another similar phrase, to my gret ese, iii. 194. The of is much used; a man may be of the blod real, like the former be of his kin. We know free (potens) of the guild; this leads the way to have avantage of, ii. 77. The old phrase of twenty wyntres age is now changed into I was twelf yere of age, ii. 167; there is also of old (quondam), ii. 216. The former of (since) childhood is changed into of a childe, ii. 261, which comes into our Bible. In iii. 267 stands at regard of; we now change the at into an in. In the phrase at after souper, ii. 319, two prepositions are combined. We have seen bi wai to in the ‘Cursor Mundi;’ we now find by way of possibilittee, ii. 39. There is awaiting on (watching for) the rain, ii. 109.¹ The phrase have pity is followed by both the old of and the later on; have mercy on is in iii. 25. Love, in this respect, follows mercy; we see amerous on Dorigen; hence the later dote on, be sweet on. The old notion of hostility connected with on is plain in the peple rose upon him, iii. 167. There is a union of the meanings of post and propter in the upon, which stands in do execution upon your ire, iii. 253. The old upland (rus) is well known; Chaucer expands the phrase, talking of a parson dwelling up on lond, ii. 21. He often substitutes in for the older on, as in this wise, ii. 398. In iii. 70 stands he was bonde in a recognisance; and we hear of Advocats lerned in the lawe, iii. 94. The out, when added to Verbs, does not always answer to the Latin ex, but for the first time expresses super, as in the line, “Men may the old out-renne, but not out-rede” (ii. 73).

In our days an outrider is something most different from the man who outrides you. There is the phrase out of dette. The mingling of colours is expressed by betwixt; they gloweden bytwixe yolw and reed (red). See 2134.

The Interjections are Cockis bones! (where the first word is a corruption of our term for Deus); clum (our mum), ii. 108; ey benedicite! kepe, kepe (to entice a horse), ii. 122; O goode God! ii. 262; for Goddes sake! make an o (a call for silence), ii. 76; good morwe! ii. 107; by the blood of Crist, that is in Hailes, iii. 49; fy for shame! iii. 182; Straw! iii. 228 (elsewhere it is straw for thy tale!) What, divel of helle! iii. 237; By our Lady (an oath that lasted 300 years), iii. 241. There are numbers of expletives in the ‘Reve’s Tale,’ which gives us a fine specimen of the Yorkshire brogue of 1390.

The parenthesis now begins to make its way in England; there is one of six words at the top of iii. 19.

The words akin to the Dutch and German, first found in Chaucer, are romble, rimple (rumple), to houle, husch, kyke (intueri), tub, chippe, utter,² to bumble, forpamper (pamper), snort, stew (vivarium). The word gat-tothed is said to come from the Dutch gat, a hole. There is ingot, from the Dutch verb ingieten.

The Scandinavian words are box (alapa), rate (exprobrare), scantness, gap, dairy, stalk (of a flower), frakne (freckle),¹ rammish, line (tegere), gaze, strogle, calf (sura), dapple, blot (macula), sluttish, lull, stale, ruggi (hirsutus). Chaucer seems to have settled that we should use the Danish cross (cruz) and not the French form crouche or croice.

The Celtic words are pie, bucket, cut (draw cut), crone (vetula), drudge, bodkin.

The French words are many, though the time of their great inroad was not now, but in the youth of Chaucer's grandfather. Our poet disregards the Old French aprouchier a, and makes his verb aprouch govern an accusative. There is heronsew (young heron), the French herouncel; the English word is still alive in Yorkshire; it is Spenser's hernshaw, of which Shakespere has an odd corruption in Hamlet. We hear of precious (precise) folk, ii. 295; this new sense of the word seems to have arisen in France in this Century. Bribe is used in our sense of the word, but Piers had employed it differently. Chaucer uses prose, as Brunetto Latini had done a hundred years earlier. He coins the female form markisesse. Stomak is used as a synonym for heart or pity, ii. 210; and this sense lasted for 200 years. The French had an old word pulent (stinking); and Chaucer uses the new form polecat. Office is used for a "place of business," ii. 214; and officer for a "man of business," iii. 62. The word chere was changing its meaning at London as well as in Lancashire; in iii. 69 a man makes feste and chere; hence our good cheer; see also p. 68. In ii. 270 chere stands for cheerfulness. In the phrase do his fantasie, the last word slides into the meaning of voluntas. In iii. 172 demain stands for dominium; later it expressed the soil under a man's dominium; estate has run a parallel course to domain. We see a new Adjective estatelich (stately). A phrase of Shoreham's is repeated; accordant to his wordes was his chere, ii. 313. Chaucer's as touching this, iii. 105, seems a compound between the old as to and the new French touching. In ii. 86 stands the reufullest, passing over of Emelie; here the Participle evidently represents præter, and seems to have been confounded with a Verbal Noun. In iii. 1 comes I preise thy wit, considering thin youthe; this Participle must be the Dative Absolute, with us understood. The French attendu que seems to have been imitated in out of mesure, considered the power that, etc., iii. 148; thus we have in Chaucer both the Active and Passive Participle of consider, and in a new idiom. Manning's because is slightly altered in the following sentence; it mighte be no bet, and cause why, there was no, etc., ii. 124. This cause why may still be heard. The word alkymistre (alchemist) has a curious ending, iii. 236. We have lost the old form surveance, iii. 32, and have had to replace it by surveillance. The verb remue is both transitive and intransitive in the one page, iii. 17, like our modern form of it, remove.

French and English synonyms are combined in pour sely Grisildis and veray sothe; the suppose, which was to all but drive out wene, is found alongside of it in ii. 191. The title Dan was usually applied to a monk in England; but in ii. 112 Dan Gerveis is a smith; we hear also of Dan Pharao, iii. 189. To floyte stands for our "play the flute." In ii. 21 burdown (burden) is connected with music; this of late years our penny-a-liners have chosen to alter into refrain. We hear of low spirites, ii. 41; something in Barbour's way; also of manie (mania), and humours fantastike; a sense used by Brunetto Latini when writing in French. A man abyes something cruelly, ii. 69; Barbour had something like this. The new murmur stands by the side of the old grutching, ii. 179. There is up (upon) peine of losse, ii. 76, imitating a more Teutonic phrase of Layamon's. The word semi, entering into an English compound, is first found in semi soun, ii. 110. Richesse is used as a Plural, iii. 361. There are words like motley, sessions, a cordial, a chanterie, miscarry, squirrel, quart, statue, theatre, pencil, haberdasher, spaniel, pike (lucius), hochepot, raftes, jade, askance, a horse's trais, to squire, quail, mosel (muzzle), bay (a horse), modifie, to founder, parish clerk, intellect, plugue, trill (volvere), *coin, taile (tally), gaudy, peck (a measure), similitude, species, curfew, testif, vitailier, dis (dice), abusion, jergon, diffinitioun, market-place, plesant, magike, veal, omnipotent, bitour (bittern), approver (informant), jubilee, froun, deity, mansion, jupartie (jeopardy), giser (gizzard), velouette (velvet), sole (solus), orisont (horizon), hemisperie, probleme, demonstratif, felicitee, deliberatioun, to accomplise, by rote, mitaine (mitten), policie, franks, basilicok (basilisk), to envolupe (envelope), countour (counting house), naturally, popet, gingerbred, impudence, superfluitee, inordinate, gentrie, artelrie, cosin germain, dampnably, joconde, suburbs, mortifye, conceit (thought), wel disposed (sanus), humilitee, botel (of hay), dissolute. We hear of an esy man, one of your sort, a propre man, propre name, the straitte of Maroc, as like as possible, to abroche a tonne, cause a herte wo, dye in greyn, gentles of honour, sawfly sey, every comfort possible, have his acquaintance, his apertenauntes, hold the mene, a pair of tonges. The gamblers' terms sis, cink, treye, borrowed from France, are in full use. The new verbs cese and pay are driving out stint and gild, just as roll is fast elbowing out wallow; and pray is encroaching on bid. The phrase by menes of was coming in. The word fume expresses ira; Littré gives no instance of this in France before the Fifteenth Century. The word honour shifts its accent in the line—*

“Ne see ye not this honourable knight?” (ii. 304).

Labour does the same in iii. 3. There are many Adjectives ending in able, like suffrable. The word cape (headland), ii. 13, seems to come from the Gascon traders; Littré gives no earlier employer of it in Northern France than Rabelais. We find in ii. 326 unbocle his galoche; the first hint of our galoshes. The verb plie (bend) is found in ii. 279. In ii. 173 stands I told no store of it; we should say set no store by it; the noun takes the new sense of pretium. Entend to a thing is in ii. 211; in other parts of England this became atend; but the former verb in this sense held its ground for many years. Chaucer often yokes French words with their English brethren, talking of seuretee or sikernesse, robbe and reve. About this time the language spoken at the French Court was much studied in England, to the neglect of the old French of 1280; thus we find in Chaucer the later renomée as well as renoun; and Gower has the new hélas instead of the old allaz. There are both humilitéé and humblesse. Obedient and obeisant stand in the same page, iii. 317; repentant and repenting stand together in iii. 278; also do penitence, as well as penance, iii. 320. Chaucer sometimes leans to the Latin rather than the French, writing equal as well as equality, perfection as well as parfit. The verb appose (question) is found, whence comes our pose; Apposition day is kept in some schools. The word acquaintance stands for friends, ii. 227. In ii. 300 we read—

“Passe-over is an ese, I say no more.”

The first word of this was to become well known four generations later. Humanitee stands for kindness in ii. 239. The word conclusion in iii. 18 means purpose, like the Teutonic end; Americans still conclude to do a thing, where Englishmen resolve. We hear in iii. 20 of disee (trouble) leading to death; it is easy to see how the word got its graver sense, after this time. In iii. 71 stands to make strangeness between, etc.; here our estrangement is clearly foreshadowed. The old pitez had slid in France during this Century into the shade of meaning now expressed by their dommage; c'estoit grans pitez que; Chaucer imitates this in his it is a gret pitee to, etc.¹ So fond had we got of the ending in ish for a verb that the French vaincre had now to imitate finir, and become venquish in England; there was a form vainquir in this Century. The Romance defend keeps its Latin sense, and also its later French meaning. The ‘Chanones Yemannes Tale’ abounds in the technical words of chemistry, like amalgam, calcen, mercurie, etc. We read of something that ne was but a just unce, iii. 237; we should now say, “was but just an ounce.” A knight stands in a lady’s grace, iii. 240; it would now be, “in her good graces.” Manning had talked of a ded cors; Chaucer speaks of a living corps,

iii. 39. He has a vast amount of French in his verse, even without reckoning the technical words of certain crafts. In iii. 160 one line has every weighty word French—

“Glorie and honour, regne, tresour, and rent.”

So in ii. 142—

“Imprudent emperour of Rome, alas !”

In iii. 31 we have—

“For which she floured in virginitee,
With all humilitee and abstinence,
With all attemperance and patience,
With mesure eke, of bering and array, Discrete she was.”

Chaucer's Friar, one of the best sketches here, is always interlarding his English with French ; his brethren's sermons, a hundred years earlier, had sadly marred our English tongue. P. 150—

O Thomas, jeo vous die, Thomas, Thomas !
Now dame, quod he, jeo vous die sanz doute.”

Chaucer has eighteen lines ending in the rime aille, ii. 272 ; an exercise of ingenuity. He makes mention often of Chepe (Cheapside) ; he also touches on the bacon of Dunmow, ii. 174. He has various bywords, such as—

“Who so first cometh to the mill, first grint” (ii. 179).

That is, “first come, first served.”

“To maken vertue of necessite (ii. 91) ;
But I wot best, wher wringeth me my sho” (ii. 283).

We substituted pinch for wring 200 years later. A woman asks the Friar how he fares—

“Dame, quod he, right wel,
As he that is your servant every del” (ii. 222).

Hence comes the polite “your servant, Sir.”

The attestation, as soth as God is king, is in ii. 275.

In ii. 282 stands—

“Your herte hongeth on a joly pin.”

Hences comes our “to be on the merry pin.”

In iii. 242 stands bet than never is late.

In iii. 285 many smal maken a gret.

Chaucer, who first brought in the ten-syllabled riming lines, has a dig at old-fashioned Alliterative English in iii. 257—

“I cannot geste, rom, ram, ruf, by my letter,
And, God wote, rime hold I but litel better.”

His most ambitious attempt at Teutonic rime is in ii. 187—

“Whoso that bildeth his hous all of salwes,
And pricketh his blind hors over the falwes,
And suffereth his wif to go seken halwes,
Is worthy to be honged on the galwes.”

As to the ‘Legend of Good Women’ (Chaucer Society, part ii. 60), it is written in the new ten-syllable metre of the Canterbury Tales, England’s chosen measure. The former Anton now becomes Antony (Antonius). We see our usual contraction of the ed in loved, p. 110; here the e is not sounded—

“That lovyd him bettre than hirsself, I gesse.”

The g is struck out; tigel becomes tyle. Among the Substantives are half godys (demigods). Chivalry was now influencing our English speech; the new womanhod, p. 92, is coined to express womanly dignity; our fathers, rather later, talked of “the worship of womanhood.” Another new word lustynesse seems to express strength in p. 103. The word menynge adds the sense of statuere to that of significare, p. 76; my menyng was to, etc. The word fellowship here means comitatus, a band of followers, p. 90. In p. 112 Lucretia bids her servants do her besynesse; this seems to mark the time when the new sense of negotium came into the word; the phrase may here mean (her had two senses) either “to do the servants’ diligence” or “to perform the affairs of the mistress.” There is the curious new compound, your home comynge, p. 123. In p. 126 stands, it was not thi doynge. In p. 127 ago, following the French past, is made a substantive; the venym of so longe ago; it is the same with auld lang syne. In p. 108 a man knows the arts of love without boke; that is, by heart.

Among the Adjectives are botomles. The trew man is opposed to thief, in p. 76. We see thike as hayle, p. 81; Jason is called a grate gentilman, p. 106; in the next line likely is followed by an Infinitive, I think for the first time. The old fremde (extraneous) was now going out in the South; for it is altered into strange in one of the Manuscripts, p. 92.

As to the Pronouns, we see the new phrase thanke my lady here, p. 75; hitherto this title had been used only in the Vocative; the French madame was the original followed here. We find the Dative; while breath lasteth me, p. 121.

Among the new Verbs are finger, it is ovyrblow (overblown), lie in my power, do him honoure, have suspicion of, have compassion of. The verb fire is applied in an abstract sense; hir beaute fyred them, p. 91. The verb pull is now used by us for row; this is first found in p. 129, oars pulleth forth the vessel. The verb choose once more is followed by an Infinitive, p. 77, she ches to dye. The verb skip is used for festinare, p. 80; the writer says he will skip to the effect (upshot); with us it is readers who skip. We have seen hope to God; we now have the new phrase wissh to God that, etc., p. 84. The do, as we see, is here employed in new phrases; Medea does company to Jason (entertains him), p. 108; hence our "company manners."

As to the Adverbs, in p. 113 stands doune was the sonne, a new way of expressing the sunset.

A new sense of with (famous for) appears in p. 68; Cleopatre with all thy passioun, like Thebes with his old walls in the 'Canterbury Tales.' The for now follows an adjective, too longe for me, p. 118; it had earlier followed a Passive verb.

The Scandinavian words are clift (scissura), mase (labyrinth), p. 120.

Among the Romance words are balade, grapnel, tenour, ceptre (sceptrum), to corrup, hostess, to poss (push), narcotiks, opies (opiates), floury (flowery). The word beauty now gets the sense of decus, and is found in the Plural, hide ye your beuteis, p. 68. The word person now takes the sense of pulchritudo; he was (a man) of persone, p. 80. Dido is said to be in hir devocyoun, p. 92; hence the later, "at her devotions." When the Argo is mentioned, p. 104, we hear of pilot Tiphys, corrupted by later scribes into Philotetes; this pilot, evidently a puzzling word, did not become common in England until 1530. The word queynt still keeps its old sense of callidus when applied to the Labyrinth, p. 120.

The Northern forms used by Chaucer in this piece are upriste (uprose), have at thee, p. 102, her trew love (lover), rokke, not roche.

In the same volume are contained a few of Chaucer's poems of this date. In p. 165 stands do law (right), a new sense of the word. In p. 148 the verb to lord is coined, to express dominari. In p. 159 we see our common jalousye be hanged! There is the new noun scarcete. In p. 150 is an instance of the two meanings of seize (1, possess, endow, and 2, take); a fish is cesed with the hook.

I have already mentioned Cambridge; I next turn to Oxford, which had been lately roused by the preaching of Wickliffe; she was now glowing with a fiery heat unknown to her since the days of the earlier Franciscans. The questions at this time in debate had the healthiest effect upon the English tongue, though they might jar upon Roman interests. Wickliffe, during his long residence in the South, seems to have unlearned the old dialect he must have spoken when a bairn on the banks of the Tees. His first childish lessons in Scripture were most likely drawn from the legends of the 'Cursor Mundi.' He was now bestowing a far greater blessing upon his countrymen, and was stamping his impress upon England's religious dialect, framed long before in the 'Ancren Riwle' and the 'Handlyng Synne.'

Purvey, after referring to Bede and Alfred as translators of the Bible "into Saxon, that was English, either comoun langage of this lond," writes thus: "Frenshe men, Beemers, and Britons han the bible, and othere bokis of devocioun and of expositioun, translatid in here modir langage; whi shulden not English men have the same in here modir langage, I can not wite, no but for falsenesse and negligence of clerkis, either for oure puple is not worthi to have so greet grace and gifte of God, in peyne of here olde synnes. God for his merci amende these evele causis, and make our puple to have and kunne and kepe truli holi writ, to liif and deth!"¹ Purvey and his friends stand out prominently among the writers who settled England's religious dialect; not many of the words used in the Wickliffite version have become obsolete within the last 500 years. The holy torch was to be handed on to a still greater scholar in 1525; for all that, Wickliffe is remarkable as the one Englishman who in the last 1100 years has been able to mould Christian thought on the Continent; Cranmer and Wesley have had small influence but on English-speaking men.

Wickliffe had much help from Purvey and Hereford. The latter of these, who translated much of the Old Testament, strove hard to uphold the Southern dialect, and among other things wrote daunster, syngster, after the Old English way. But the other two translators leant to the New Standard, the East Midland, which was making steady inroads on the Southern speech. They write daunseresse, dwelleresse, etc., following Robert of Brunne, who first led the way to French endings fastened to English roots. They also write ing for the Active Participle, where Hereford writes the old ende; they do not follow him in employing the Southern Imperative Plural.

Among Wickliffe's phrases, now embodied in our Bible, are these: verili, make hole, wot, yea, nay, sobrenesse, damesele, depart (ire), raveyn, cumpasen the se and the lond, moche cumpanye, grucche, man servant, ledd caytif (captive), comarundour, tittle, oygnement, take a counsel, liche maner, make clene, go out for to se, duke, gedre togidre, bleynes, sit at mete, justify you, stablisch, brend offringis, wildernesse, first fruytis, to coveit, press togidere, cubit, haply, seer, to spuyl, botler, pupplican, peraventure, streit zate, set fast his face, sepulcre, oost (host), fro the sunne goynge down, anon, male and female, smyte, kike azens the pricke, travel (laborare), prudent, encrese, to mete (measure), infirmytees, magnify, be of good coumfort, spuylis (spolia), desolat, scrip, tabernacle, just man, suffice, tradiciouns, enter in, scribe, interpret, minister, proverbe, mageste, profit, sykenessis, biwayle, reprovys (opprobria), to compas about, to poll, agonye, continue, bere witness, to thringen (throng), flix of blood. His Jonas, Bethanye, Jerico, Pharisee, Galilee, etc., remain much as he left them.

The great fault of Wickliffe is, that he sticks close to the Latin idioms he was translating; his English therefore is but poor, if compared with that of the year 1000. I give a specimen of his Latinisms from the 'Vulgate;' some of his renderings, as may be here seen, are downright blunders—

Wickliffe.	Vulgate.
Derknessis	Tenebræ.
Weddingus	Nuptiæ.
Nyl ye	Nolite.
Synguler	Singuli.
Sudarie	Sudarium.

May not have hatid	Non potest odisse.
Doynge gracies	Gratias agens.
It is seen to me	Visum est mihi.

She is foundun	Inventa est. ¹

There are also phrases like loovis of proposicioun, uttermore (exterior), p. 115; evenyng was maad, whom seien ze me to be? my volatilis (fatlings) ben slayn, a noble man. . . Barabas, p. 151; we syzen sum oon for to caste out fendis, zyve vois, touche ether (vel) the hem, architriclyn. Castel is used to English castellum (village); Judas is led by penaunce, not by repentance, to mourn his crime; sine liberis becomes without fre children, p. 407. The Ablatives Absolute are rendered most literally. It is clear that there was great room for another version of Scripture, after Wickliffe's time. Still we have followed him in some things, which I here set out—

Wickliffe.	Tyndale.
Son of perdicoun	That lost chyld.
It is good us to be here	Here is good beinge for us.

Wickliffe was himself a Northern man, but he had long lived at Oxford; hence there is a curious mixture of two dialects in his writings. There are the Northern saif, fro, no but, gyilty, maist, bitokist, what manere man, bundel, fighting man, birye, homly, sister, overpass, oft tymys, deme (putare), postle, she ass, the which, tolbope (tolbooth), loss, handmaiden, hurtle, slauztre, a zong oon, he hungred, turn upsodown. The Past Participle is clipped, as founden, not yfounden. The word wench is used in the honourable sense of the North; it is applied to a rich man's child, p. 41, and to the daughter of Herodias, p. 195. He is to be bitraied, p. 89, recalls Orrmin's extension of the Passive Voice; it is very different from the old ys to sylleune. Take seems to drive out nim. We see Hampole's curious austerne, p. 399; the Verbal Nouns are in great force. In p. 123 stands swolowynge; the second o is a mark of the North, like aro for arwe (sagitta).

The Southern forms are children, britheren, moche, oo (unus), olypi, axe, gon (ire), ey (ovum), beth, clepe, culver (columba), morewynge (mane), tho (illi), to have be (fuisse). We find the Southern thilke, and also the synonym the ilke, p. 241. The to (dis) is sometimes prefixed. The heren (illorum), p. 17, is a curious mixture of South and North; zoure stands in p. 307, instead of the Northern yours. The old Imperative fare ge is altered in p. 45 to goth ze, a form never allowed of old. The Participle in inge is well established.

Among the Vowels the a encroaches on the e in the true Northern fashion, as sarpent; the old aemete is here seen both as amte and emte (ant and emmet). This a replaces o, for of feor becomes afer, our afar; e supplants o in the form rekevere for recover;¹ and there is the very contracted form halpens, p. 355. The initial e is docked, as stablish. The old Participle gewefan becomes woven. The e is struck out; owef becomes oof, our woof. There are forms like goist and doith; it may be that here the o and the i were both sounded, thus preparing the way for our modern oi. A new word may be formed by simply changing a vowel; thus pund, pound, is an enclosure referring to land, and Wicliffe's new pond refers to water. The of was both a Preposition and an Adverb; Wicliffe marks the difference very clearly by writing the latter as off; to leeve off, p. 97. The old shephirde is now written sheperde, with the h dropped, p. 43. We have seen the Verbal Noun pungetung much earlier; we now see the verb punch. The d is struck out of the old verb windwe, for this is sometimes written winewe, our winnow. The th is added, for the noun deope becomes here depthe, imitating lengthe. Hampole's parlesi is now pared down to palsie. The older gredire is now turned into grediren (gridiron). The French sc for s or c often occurs, as in resceyve, which follows science. Latin endings are often clipped; we see Thadee (the Irish Thady), Susanne, and Joone (Joanna), as in Manning.

Wicliffe, a true Northerner, is fond of Verbal Nouns, such as outgoynngis, bindingis, dwellingis; there are also forms like the comynngis togidere of, the togidere bindingus, the fallyng doun of, betynge togidre of teeth, the rysing azen fro dede men, p. 409. Here the construction, trying to imitate the Latin, is most clumsy, owing to the fact that few Prepositions could now be prefixed to our home-born roots. The loss of her old compounding powers is the great shortcoming of the New English. There is sittyng place, p. 121. We find waking, p. 199, for the old wæcce (watch). The French ess, as in Chaucer, is tacked on to English roots, as synneresse; Wicliffe felt himself obliged to English somehow the Latin peccatrix. The English ness is employed to compound pesibleness, p. 37, differing from peace and peacefulness; also pornes (poverty); we now give meanings, slightly varied, to these seeming synonyms. There are new words like gelding (eunuchus), nedleworke, dweller, taris (zizania), roodhors (roadster), seer, schipbreche; in this last we have confounded the English breche with the Scandinavian wreck, which meant "something drifted ashore." He uses man to coin new words, such as domesman (judex), p. 21. He turns the old English cip (surculus) into chit (catulus). One effect of Latin influence was to alter the old way of reckoning time ; he wes twelf wintre now becomes he was maad of twelve 3eeris, p. 283. Still, the winters (anni) lasted for 200 years after this time. Wickliffe is fond of the even prefixed to nouns, as even-servaunt ; he has stoc in the sense of progenies (Isaiah xlvi. 19) ; the heiztus (hills), the outcastinge (offscouring).

Among the Adjectives we see the French ending able, as in Hampole, tacked on to an English root ; unquenchable is in p. 287. The form gladsum appears, replacing the Old English adjective glædlic ; and fon (stultus) is seen as fonned, our fond. There are new words like clezi (clayey). Chaucer's lawful is more Teutonic than Wickliffe's leefful, p. 235, which seems to come from the French lei ; the Old English leafful had meant fidus. Older adjectival forms are set aside in favour of wrongful, or rather wrongfully, p. 287. In the same page we see a strengere than I ; this form was also used by Tyndale ; in the oldest English no Article had been employed here. As to the Pronouns, there is an awkward construction in p. 235, whos wyf of these schal sche be ? and again in p. 371, whos asse of 3owre schal fulle ? We find the goyngus of hem, not "their goings." The old who-soever is cut down to who evere, p. 45, like the older what evere ; in Purvey's version of the Bible, about 1390, hou ever stands for how so ever ; in the Prologue, p. 459, stands 3e worschipeu that that 3e witen ; here one that stands for id, the other for quod ; in old times the first that would not have appeared. The Definite Article, contrary to old usage, is dropped in John Baptist ; this has been followed by Tyndale. In the words, I 3elde the fourefold, p. 397, Wickliffe goes nearer to the Gothic than to the Old English ; in the latter, bi stands before the Numeral.

Turning to the Verbs we observe the constant Northern leaning to shall in preference to will ; as (the weather), shal be cleer, though this is but a bare Future, p. 81 ; so he shal seie to us, p. 110. In p. 245 stands the curious whanne 3e schulen wolle ; here the last word is the verb desire ; the old wilnian was to last but seventy years longer. The Latin Participle in urus is strangely Englished ; the world to comynge, p. 395 ; he that was to doynge this, p. 417 ; here we have the usual confusion of ynge with en, the old Infinitive ; in the South they wrote to witiende. The very un-English idiom, Erode dead (mortuo Herode) is in p. 9. Chaucer's phrase gesse, so well known to Americans, is much in favour ; the Old English ne, wene ic becomes nay, I gesse, p. 387 ; and this was to be altered by Tyndale into I trowe not. The upstart put is always encroaching upon set, do, and other hoary old verbs ; we see put away. Words like endure had long been known ; this French en is now prefixed to English roots, as to enfat (make gross), p. 63 ; on the other hand, the old inlyzten has not yet become our enlighten. There are the phrases graven things (not images), keep hospitalité, give sentence, do fornycacioun, make suggestioun. Sometimes the verb, the most important part of the sentence, is set first ; as gon shul Gentiles ; opened shul be thi gates. Wickliffe coins the word to undirzock for the Latin equivalent. Where he has fer be it, Purvey, ten years later, writes God forbede ! which we keep ; it had first appeared in the 'Cursor Mundi.' In Isaiah lxvi. 15 we read of four-horsid carres. The old minnen (meminisse) is discarded, and the adjective minde (memor) suggests to Wickliffe the verb minde, as we use it now. The verb drench retains its old meaning mergere, and takes the further meaning inebriare, Deuteronomy xxxii. 42, "I shal drenche myn arewis in blood." The word poune (conterere), our pound, stands in p. 113 ; it was known before the Conquest. The phrase turn the hous upsodown stands in p. 377. In p. 359 stands Mirk's ze neden thes thingis ; Orrmin would have inserted a to after the verb. We see the verb tinkle, which, like its Dutch brother, seems to be formed from the sound. The Old English mistrowen stands side by side with the Scandinavian mistrosten. There are many Latin words beginning with in ; these Wickliffe translates by English words, on which he bestows a similar prefix ; thus invocare becomes inclepe.

As to Adverbs we find the word hard is used as an Adverb, p. 393 ; in p. 99 this becomes of hard. Hence came our hardly (vix) seventy years later.

As to the Prepositions, have mercy on and have mercy of stand in the same verse, p. 95. Under is prefixed to a foreign verb, undermine, p. 131; and there is also to over-traveile them; the under and over are two of the very few prepositions with which we can now freely compound; they differ much from for, of, and with. Two prepositions are coupled in kepe it unto withouten ende, Exodus xii. 24.

We see the interjection whist, Judges xviii. 19.

There are the Celtic words spigot, strumpet, and gogil-yzed (monoculus), p. 219. The new words, akin to the Dutch and German, are grasp, tramp, trample, botch, cote (mergus), pacche, schog (shock, agitare).

Among the Scandinavian words we see "a wellid thing togidre;" this is the source of our verb weld, from the Swedish välla. There are also backe (vespertilio, our bat), sker (scopulus, now scar), whirl, whirlwind, loosen; this last is from the Icelandic losna, not from the old losian.

Among the many French words are president, prophecy, mysterie, regeneracioun, redempcioun, unprofitable, deny, compel, fraud, enquire, supplement, unchastity, sydir (cider), meivial, lattis, magistrate, determine (i.e. appoint), procede, contrite, to glory, confoorme, exhortacioun, tributis, unstable, reputacioun, defraud, uncorrupt, liberté, offencioun, infirmayte, divide, constreyn, subplaunt, adjure, pursue, jubilee, bussument (ambush), congregacioun, besides many others that I have already noticed as embodied in our Bible. There is the phrase into ieneraciouns of ieneraciouns, often repeated. The noun forger now acquires an evil sense, very different from Chaucer's, the forgeres of errouris, Isaiah xlv. 16. In the Acts is found we camen to Puteolos; in the same way Gower was soon to write Delphos. The word malice is used of an act done by God, Jonah iii. 10. We find despisable, which is still used in America; England has changed the s into c. There is the right form circumcide; not our present form, which we have in slovenly sort derived from the Latin Passive Participle. The word veniarunce comes often here, and was to drive out the Teutonic wræc. We see hizer poweris, where the last word bears the sense of Juvenal's potestas or the later podesta. The barbarians of Melita show humanyte or curtesye; in the same chapter stand the synonyms refete or refraisch. The word duke is used for leader. The old feoh (property) has now to make way for substance, p. 377; and gost is yielding to spirit. The word defame (publish) is used in a good sense, p. 43. The seed that fell on stony ground is called temporal, p. 65, as in the 'Ayenbite;' we have since 1380 had to invent temporary to express this idea. In p. 79 we read of the parties (parts) of Tyre. The verb joye stands in p. 309; a man is let down by the sclattis (slates), p. 301; this was the earlier wattles of 1000, and the later tiling of 1525; the Scotch still sound the c in sclattis. We English talked about Easter in both of the years just named; but Wickliffe chooses to use the word Paske. We have the verb comparisoune, not compare, in p. 183. The form ympne (hymnus) is used in p. 249. The form counceil appears both for consilium, p. 549, and for concio, p. 515. To travaile is used where we should put trouble, p. 329; the interchange between these two verbs was constant for the next two Centuries. The word marchaunt is used for hireling, p. 503; and the former word was employed as a term of abuse by Bonner, nearly 200 years later; fermour stands for steward, p. 381. We have both the verb cure and do the cure. We see dismytte instead of our dismiss, p. 553. In Judges xix. 10 a concubine appears as a secoundarie wyf; thus the word second had not been fourscore years in English use, before it gave birth to a compound, to express a new idea.

The works of Wickliffe (Early English Text Society) may now be considered. They are plainly written by a Northern man; bi weie of mercy stands in p. 59, like a phrase in the 'Cursor Mundi;' there is Barbour's of his own head; there is the phrase dailes (sine iudicio), p. 92, which reminds us of Wickliffe's use of day in his Bible. We find the Northern suppose that (si); undon (perditus), corser (usurer); the verb nede still keeps its old sense cogere, soon to disappear; the Northern Participle picchid supplants the South pight. There is the same admission of Southern forms, like hem, her, as in the Bible; Wickliffe's treatises were meant for the whole of England, and he is the Father of our New English prose.

As to Vowels, we see comend written for the usual command, p. 93; we were later to have both forms of the Romance verb. The e gives way to oi, as doiþ (facit); the i supplants o and e; there is Cicile, pariche (parish), diocise; the i in the middle is struck out, for we find capteyn in p. 100; the u is inserted, as besum for besme, our besom.

As to Consonants, the g is struck out; he alæid stands for the old alegged, p. 70; the c is inserted, as strecte for the old streite; this imitation of the Latin paved the way for strict a hundred years later. The h is clipped, as osteler for hosteler, p. 181; also Grosted, p. 61.

Among the Substantives are almeszever, Rome renner, dede hondis (mortmain, p. 131), broþel (nebulo), wynnynge (lucrum), wiþ hook or wiþ crok, p. 250, cope of heaven. We see the phrase hangyng, drawyng, quarterynge, the order of the words that has come down to us. In p. 48 we see how will came to stand for testamentum; þis testament is riztful wille of dede Fraunseis (the dead Francis). In p. 60 business stands first for industria, then for negotium; the senses of sollicitudo must have been here the connecting link. In p. 94 truth adds the sense of veritas to that of fides, and becomes Plural; treupes of Goddis lawe; in the same way myztis is used for powers of the soul, p. 217. In p. 67 we have money or money worþ; we should now make the third word a Genitive. In p. 174 we read that drunkenness was coloured by the priests with the name of good felaweschipe; this sense of the latter word lasted till Ascham's time. The ending ness is much used; we see worldlynesse, p. 121, manlynesse, p. 174, a polite word for ira; fonydnesse (stultitia). The word monger was beginning to be connected with crime, as lesyng-monger, p. 125. There are the phrases in right of, wombe joie (gluttony), þe dede doynge (action), zeven fulbut conseil (give headstrong counsel), full butt, p. 213. We hear of cloþis of mornynge (sorrow), p. 123; we now concisely use only the last word. In p. 252 we read of a tey dogge; this is more usually called bandog. We now employ only the Plural clothes; in p. 351 we see clothe (vestis, not pannus). In p. 477 men strive as fendis (like fiends). The priest Sir John becomes Sir Jacke, p. 192; this change is unusual. The word crox (crux) seems to be encroaching upon both rode and croice, words which it was to supplant. There is Chaucer's new idiom repeated in p. 120; we read of Benetis lif & Thomas of Canterburies; here the last three words are packed together as one Genitive.

Among the new Adjectives are fonnaid (fond), unlerned, a fat benefice, heize & myztty, heize wynes (like our "high feeding"); schepische still stands for simplex, p. 212. The great is now set before another adjective, grete fatte hors, p. 60; we see also grete foolis, p. 81; the old swipe was now dying out. The word fresh gets the new sense of hilaris, p. 123, like Scott's "fresh as May."

As to Pronouns, we find þis seynt or þis (that), p. 153. In p. 105 stands make it fals as moche as þei kunne. The a or an is put for quidam; in a manere they crucify Christ, p. 104. We had always used phrases like teoþan dæl (tenth part); we now light on something new in p. 66, þre fiftenþes, p. 66; henceforward we had no trouble in expressing fractions.

Among the Verbs we find feed it fat, it comes to sixti mark, holde (keep) hous, kepe it to his owne knowynge, help him to it, hold forþ (keep on) servants, turn nyzt into day, to cracke Latin, do þat is in hem to, etc., Chaucer's stond bi lawe, to do treupe, beried in synne. Wickliffe is fond of stop, as to stop sin. The verbs trust and look now govern an infinitive, like hope; men tristen to flee, p. 82; loke to be festid, p. 249. We are told in p. 96 that men eat their hevvyd out of witt; this is the source of "eat his head off." In p. 100 God's curse renneþ wiþ þis; hence the legal phrase, "covenants that run with the land." We hear of clepid myraclis, p. 469; we should now prefix a so. We have in the same page no drede at the head of a sentence; the forerunner of no doubt; here there is must be dropped. There is a combined idiom of the Subjunctive in p. 116; (they) myzten, couden, and wolden teche. In p. 106 stands it is to drede (timendum est), which we now put in the Passive; but in p. 222 comes stoppe (it) to be maad (from being made).

There is an imitation of the Latin Participle in p. 87, after benefice resceyved (receiving benefit); in 1360 with leave taken had appeared. Past Participles like come and gone had taken is or are before them; this is now extended to other verbs; (they) ben copen in (crept in), p. 296. In p. 104 prelates are chokid wiþ talow of worldly goods; this accounts for the future chock full.

As to Adverbs, the Latin undique is thus expressed in p. 126; on alle sidis. We saw in 1160 how rather added the meaning of potius to that of citius; the same addition is made in p. 240 in the case of sooner; God would sooner hear the oppressed poor than the hypocritical rich. In p. 128 we find curatis may almost gete no bok; here almost and get should change places; this wrong transposition of words is a common fault in our day.

Among the Prepositions we remark to þis ende (the old to þam þæt), to live on poore men, he is more to God (to Godward), p. 468; traitour to him (not his traitor). The for comes between a Noun and an Infinitive; it is pride for a man to make, etc., p. 82; here the sense of destination comes in; as in 1280 (he was brought for her to see). Priests savour of certain things, p. 97, a new idiom after this verb. In p. 201 a prayer is of auctorite; here no adjective precedes the of, as always before; some things are nouzt of bileve (need not be believed), p. 482.

There is the Celtic word knack (trick), used also by Chaucer.

The Romance words are synguler (applied to the Pharisees' religion), satrap, generaly, coyn, armes (heraldic), crier, vessel (plate), jurour, irregular, suspend (priests), poyntis (of faith), expresly, viser, vicious, annueler (a priest paid by the year), jurisdiction, crie out on them, temporalities, pension, usurer, recreation, pagyn (pageant), crocer (crosier), unable to, etc., sophistrie, apostata, obeische (obey), volym (volume), stress beasts (distress for rent), to disgrate (disgrace), professouris of law, to present clerks, the ordynary, evidence (ratio), morals, specifie, infidelity, discuss, canonyse, corier (currier), to perpetual, horroure, to distemper, to limit to. There is the curious babwynrie, formed from baboon, p. 8. There is the new Lord of compaynes (hosts), p. 58, the first time that we employed this word in a military sense. Clerks used to get benefices for countynge, p. 65; that is, for acting as accountants. Not only a king, but a curate, had sugetis (subjects), p. 73. A man is convycted in the law court, p. 75; we employ convince in another way. We see deschaunt used of Church music, p. 77; hence our descant. There is the phrase save a man's body in p. 174; where the verb is used in Chaucer's new sense. There is the verb dow, p. 103; to endow was to come in Occleve's time. We see occupy (ply business) in p. 104. There is aver (habere, property) in p. 119; this word has had its influence on our later be-haviour. The word applynge is used as a synonym for prayer in p. 134, a sense still in vogue. A priest, we are told, may be a dampnyd fend (fiend), p. 153; also a blynde bosard (buzzard), p. 157. In this last page we read that the Old Testament is practised, carefully studied, as a matter of business. In p. 162 glorious is used in a bad sense, being applied to priests' habits. In p. 181 stands potestat (dominus), soon to be altered into potentate. In p. 469 we hear of lordis & comyns; in p. 231 of comyn wymmen (meretrices). The word patroun is applied in p. 285 to the founder of an Order; it is easy to see how pattern arose. The word trental is curious, as a Church word coming from the French, not from the Latin. There is both despeyre and desperacion. A priest might get a living by acting either as a kechen clerk or a penne clerk, p. 246; they also acted as architects. The English for (Latin per) is prefixed to French verbs, as forbar and forfend; the latter usurped the French meaning of defend (vetare). Testaments are proved in p. 277. In p. 302 sensible is used for "perceptible by sense;" we employ sensibly in this way. We read of pseudo-prophetis; also of pseudoes, p. 308; this influx of Greek is something new; there is autorise with its Greek ending in p. 320. The word accident is connected with the Eucharist, and is called his newe word, p. 466. We read of the godis of fortune, p. 473; hence "a man of fortune."

We have, in p. 467, the proverb crounne and cloþ maken

no prest; hence the clergy are in our day sometimes spoken of as the cloth. There is also, charite schuld bigyne at hemself, p. 78. In p. 131 we hear that the clergy will not stop until the whole land has passed into mortmain. The crying evil of impropriations is pointed out in p. 97; the lower clergy were robbed by appropriynge of parische chirchis; in these a poor ignorant vicar was set for little cost, p. 116; men took orders to say masses for money. Even in these early times Antinomian opinions were abroad; some, p. 351, said, "late me synne ynowe, for God wole nevere lese þat he haþ dere bouzt."

The 'Rolls of Parliament' are a mine of our language, beginning from the year 1386, when the London Mercers sent up the first English petition in a style very like Chaucer's; see vol. iii. 225. But that poet's zeldehalle is now seen as Guyldehalle; thus the Severn combination of u with i or y was established at London. We see a new substantive in arrysers ayeins the pees; Barbour's rising became another word for rebellion. The London tradesmen appear as the craftes; as if ars were to stand for artifex. The Petition is directed against Nichol Brembre, Mayor of London; we see a very early English pun on his name (bramble); the Mercers call the forsaid Brere or Brembre a ragged subject. The Lords of the Council are addressed collectively as yowre worthy Lordship; a slight change in the use of this title was soon to come; a favourite phrase, used here and long afterwards, was be good Lorde to hym. There is the new Northern phrase noughtwithstondyng the same. We find it hath been out of mynde; we should now make time the middle word. A new use of by appears; wrongs done to them by longe tyme passed. The Northern word for journeying appears in London, travail en barfote; the two last words are curious.

John Trevisa in 1387 finished a long task, that of turning into Southern English the huge Latin Chronicle, compiled by Higden some few years earlier; thus much of the world's history was thrown open to laymen. Trevisa was Vicar of Berkeley in Gloucestershire, and wrote at the request of the Lord of that village. His dialect is unmistakably Southern; he has many words and phrases that appeared in the 'Ancren Riwle.' He has forms peculiar to the Severn country, but we see that the Northern dialect is forcing its way into Gloucestershire; thus there are the forms afire, apirst, i. 119, and stripe (exuere), not strupe, i. 265; there are brittle and sighes; the Verbal Nouns abound; the same replaces ilk (idem); there are also nor, þey, þaire, þaym, unto. As to Vowels we find initial a clipped, as in the Romance bate. The e is inserted, for wesle becomes wesel (weasel). The old Colonia appears as Coleyn; there must have been the prior forms, Colune, Coloin. Another famous German city is seen as Mens, the future Mentz. The South-Eastern form ie replaces eaz in die (tingere). The initial i is clipped; for men lumine books, vii. 295; another version has lymne, and we still use limn. What is now called Poitou appears both as Peytowe and Peyto, the old confusion between o and u (ou), showing how Cardinal Peto's name arose. The name that Chaucer wrote Lowys is here seen as Lewes, i. 285; much as Lord Macaulay wrote it; Hewbert is here written for Hubert, and thus we pronounce the French duc as dewk. The proper name Boece is written Boys (a future surname); and poemata is translated by poysies. I have already remarked on the change in oi. The t is used instead of þ, as nostrelle, iii. 11; here, moreover, there is a transposition of letters. It is added to the French touffe and becomes tuft. The d is inserted in iaundis, which replaces Hampole's jaunis. The r is struck out; we read of the Charthous, vii. 305. The s is inserted, for craftesman appears instead of Layamon's craftmon. The most remarkable contraction is copweb for attercoppe web, vii. 343. Orrmin's speldren becomes our spell (syllabicare), vii. 333. The n is struck out, for bek (nutus) is formed from beknien; this letter is replaced by m; for there is Pomfreyt as well as the old Pounfret. The w is struck out; there trus (truce) as well as the old truwes.

The new Substantives are bakwateres, evel-doer, tale-teller (delator), gravestone, popehode (papacy), twylyztynge, honysoukel, forland (foreland), cok crowynge, overlip, werk-hous (of an abbey), comer, glasier. The noun horlynge (from hurlen, ruere) is used in viii. 231, to translate turbo; it may have influenced hurly burly. Trevisa's leving (way of life) translates mores, vii. 11, which is something new. In i. 325 vernale is translated springynge tyme; our old leinten (ver) was soon to be replaced by spring; in vii. 461 Lenten tyme bears its religious meaning. We see homo Englished by grome, not gome, i. 359; the old brydguma was soon to become bridegroom. In ii. 283 mention is made of beings called half goddes. In vii. 149 epitaph is explained by wrytynge on grave. In vii. 481 Danegilt becomes þe Danes golde in some manuscripts. The ending ard, as I have elsewhere remarked, was coming in; we hear of the Spaynardes, a form which replaces the Spaynols of 1350. The Verbal Noun, as in the Mandeville treatise, is further developed; it is þre dayes seillynge from Irland, i. 325; collapsus is Englished by þe fallynge togidres of, etc., ii. 119. The noun will takes a new shade of meaning, have greet will (mind) to go, vii. 377. The Latin form Bristolliā, that had been in use for 200 years, is written Brestowe, ii. 103; the stow or place of the brig. Trevisa uses the noun likpot for the finger next the thumb, vii. 73. In vii. 109, Cristean is written for the proper name Christina. Trevisa brings in a new phrase for multum; a great deel of London, vii. 311; he has also most deel for mostly.

Among the Adjectives we see manful, unfitting, schort-witted, schort-breþed; nobiles is Englished by worpy men, vii. 101. We have faire wordes (promissa). The word utter adds to its old meaning of exterior that of extremus, vi. 251. Trevisa can give nothing neater for verisimile than it semeþ like soþ, vii. 105. The two forms fleschely and fleschy may be seen in viiii. 23. The word sely gets a meaning varying from infelix, for it is used to English simplex, viiii. 91, where a very foolish act is in question. In p. 155 sly is used in its old sense sapiens; in p. 105 it is debased, being applied to a cunning plot. In p. 279 prudenciores is Englished by þe rediest men; our ready man has more to do with ræd (consilium) than with gerædian (parare). The able is added to a Teutonic word, as in Wickliffe; we have untrowable.

As to the Pronouns, the Reflexive to sit him down was a good Old English idiom; the him now becomes himself; men laughe hem selve to deap, i. 305. The his is often used to express the Genitive, as Harolde his procurynge. We saw in 1280 the phrase to love justice of all things; we now see most of eny þing, i. 263. This any replaces a in vii. 91; he lived like any anker (hermit); so wholly was the old meaning of forma (primus) lost at this time, that Trevisa writes formest fader, i. 29.

Among the Verbs are zild up a thing, fall to (irruere), put in ward, wosen out (ooze out), bid farewell (forsake), stall (install) a bishop, beat him to þe deth, have indignacioun, make inquisicioun, do bataille with, it com out clere inow (erupit in clarum), fall sik. In ii. 195 something is said to be no made tale; a new sense of the verb. In vii. 27 a man made it as þey (though) he were not wroth; in the next Century the it was replaced by countenance. We know our answer expectation; in vii. 11 fields answer þe tiliers (cultoribus). In vii. 99 Canuto secedit is Englished by he fil unto Canute; fall away must have come from an imitation of Latin. We see renew, ii. 301, the first instance, I think, of re being set before a Teutonic root. In vii. 153 manum apponere becomes put to his handes, a favourite phrase later. A man is put yn (intrusus), speaking of the Papacy; another is i-sette downe (depositus). In iii. 297 is a phrase of the 'Gamelyn,' which probably was written not far off: he up with a staf and smoot; there is leve his woodnesse, and also it hadde be i-left of; in vii. 377 desiste is Englished by leve of in one manuscript, by leve in another; there is also breke of þe sege, putte it of (differre) used of a request. This of or off was now becoming common. In vi. 333 stands bring her with childe; this sense of the verb lasted almost to our own day, as in Pope's bring you acquainted. In viii. 217 stands go a pilgrimage; the a here must represent on. In vii. 385 we read of blasyng clopes, raiment of a too conspicuous pattern; here the verb gets a new sense. The Future tense is employed in an unusual way, in ii. 235; sixe cubites, þat wil be nyne foot long; before the Conquest will in the sense of must could only be used in a question; one French idiom is, je suppose qu'il aura (must have) été frappé.

Among the new Adverbs is unlawfulliche. The old clæne, in the sense of omnino, is altered into clenliche, i. 341. We see the phrase hard ifrore (frozen), i. 325; also freschely (just) born, vii. 133. The far is now prefixed to a Present Participle, a fer casting man (sapiens) appears in viii. 285.

Among the Prepositions we remark went an huntynge, i. 173, where the an was doubtless mistaken for an Article. There is to lite by þe halvendel, too little by half; also by the space of þre dayes. The old oþ, standing before a term expressing quantity, is altered into to; to þe noumbre of two hondred, i. 341. The wiþ conveys the sense of our including; sixe schires wiþ Cornwayle, ii. 91. This preposition usually implied agreement; it is now used instead of as after same; of þe same age wiþ, ii. 259.

There are the Scandinavian scrap, squeak, rouschelynge (strepitus), which Caxton a hundred years later altered into rustlynge. The Danish skim supplies the word skymours (piratæ), i. 261; men who skim the sea. The words sprengle and twiter are allied to the Dutch and German.

Among the Celtic words are kybe (chilblain); the gobolyn of the Severn land is repeated here.

The French words are usual, capitel (letters), marl, giestes (joists), ducherie (dukedom), empechement (accusation), aray (of an army), form (bench), spiritualte (clergy), hors liter (feretrum), particuler (often used here), gruel, chanel, brigands (latrones), to aliene, to copy, plegge, pulpit, duket (ducat), conspire, quote, precious stone, to resign up, lettres patent, determine doutes, chase enemies; a new sense is given to florish; we hear of florischers of wordes, i. 7; a bishop floruit; this is turned into was in his floures, vii. 39. There is have the mays-trie (mastery). We read of an esy man; here the adjective adds the sense of lenis to that of facilis. The word curiouste is used for inquisitiveness in learning, vii. 69; the word gracious is used to translate probus, vii. 35; ungracious is used both for infaustus and sinister. The adjective noble is employed in a new sense, nobil bookes, viii. 21. In vi. 123 superiores is translated soveraynes, a word used all through the next Century, like Shakespere's "my masters." In vi. 221 conclude, already used by Piers Ploughman, gets the meaning of putare. In viii. 179 equivocatio is Englished by doubel entendement, here used by an angel; our evil double entendre, which has not been naturalised after 200 years, was to come later. In vii. 467 we see grauntsire, and also fader grauntsire (atavus); two languages are further used to compound double chynned, i. 299; we have here also the curious compound overpluse (surplus), much in use for the next two Centuries. In viii. 201 we come upon belfray, the berfray of 1360; the English bell here led the way to a false analogy. Trevisa explains the strange word commedy, i. 315, saying that it is "a song of gestes;" here the last word must mean joci, as in Manning fourscore years earlier; but in viii. 299 gestour expresses tragædus. There is the Latin incubus, i. 419. We see in ethica turned into in etykes, viii. 241, our Plural form. In vi. 259 comencement is used in its Academical sense. The verb use is employed for solere, just as in Barbour; new words and phrases crop up almost at the same moment in far distant shires. The Latin indecenter is Englished by unsemyngliche, viii. 117, an obvious imitation of the Participle form, for no ing is needed. There are the two forms avoketes and advoketes, showing the rising influence of the Latin; advise was soon to replace avis. The word gratum is translated plesynge to; the adverb plesingly is also seen. In vii. 69 quadrivium is Englished by carfouk; this recalls the Carfax of Oxford. A Latin word sometimes needed a long interpretation; thus invincibilis, vii. 103, becomes unable to be overcomen. In vii. 155 electi is Englished by pe elites; this word has never been thoroughly naturalised. There is Barbour's leeftenaunt, where the French u has been mistaken for a v; hence the f appears. The word prejudice now expresses injuria, as in law; wipoute prejudice of his chirche, vii. 263. Men might now meove (move) a cause or a question. In Domesday Book all England is described (marked out); this sense lingers in our Bible. In vii. 377 the Devil appears as pe enemy. The word exitus, vii. 193, is translated his ende and passing forþ; hence "the passing bell," and "the passing of Arthur." In the middle of the English text stands the technical in pontificalibus; Foxe is fond of the phrase.

Trevisa gives us a proverb from Seneca, vii. 5: a cok is most myzty on his dongehille; 170 years earlier it had been kene on his mixenne. In another work of our author's he puts aside the Old English ceorles wæn (Arcturus), and tells us that this star is comynly clepid in Englis Charlemaynes wayne; a phrase that lasted to 1600; this is our Charles's wain.¹ The French romances must have been most popular in England.

We now, in 1387, light once more upon an English Will; these had been made in Latin and French for the previous 300 years. Robert Corn, citizen of London, makes his bequests ('Fifty Earliest English Wills,' Early English Text Society, p. 1); he speaks of his daughter Genet, our Janet; of the werkes (buildings) of a church; the Romance word peuter occurs.

In the ballads of this time ('Political Poems,' Master of the Rolls) we see the phrase for wynt ne wederes, p. 216; here weather bears the meaning of Latin tempestas, which the word has had from the earliest times. The Scandinavian odd, first found in Lancashire, has also come South, p. 268; in the same page is the Lancashire noun blonder. We see the French substantive galauntes, and hear of a counter tenur, p. 277.

The documents, printed in Rymer, belonging to the years 1385 and 1386, show that English was at last asserting its right to appear in official papers by the side of Latin and French. We have here phrases like in proper persons, inhabitans, goodes and catels. The word law appears as laugh. There is the curious combination of nouns, no harm doings. Chaucer's during is here durant, as in the original French.

In the 'Legends of the Holy Rood' (Early English Text Society), belonging to this time, we see the noun blok and the verb loll, which are common to the Dutch.

In Gregory's Chronicle (Camden Society) we have, in the account of the year 1387, the surname Bechamp, not

Bewchamp; just as the Northern le supplanted the Southern leow (lew).

The rules of a certain London Gild (Early English Text Society) bear the date 1389; we see that our way of sounding the English word for sepelire was now settled by the Capital; the Kentish form bery appears. There are the new nouns book-bynder and hatter. We see if nede be; the 3if hit neod is of the 'Ancren Riwle.' There is the phrase it may be take þat; we should now say, taken for granted, p. 9. We find at warning; we still say "at a minute's warning."

There are some Lynne documents of the same date, 1389; the derworþe (pretiosus) was not understood at this time, for it is written der worthi, p. 58.

Foxe has printed a famous sermon, preached at Paul's Cross by R. Wimbeldon in 1388 (Cattley's edition, iii. 292). We here see the speech understood by London churchgoers under Richard II.; we may remark how their and them have come down from the North, though hem is still found; at the same time we see the Southern thelke (iste), beth (sunt), it was agoo (gone), o man (unus), ybore. The former uttermost is cut down to utmost, p. 305. There is Trevisa's living (mores), and Chaucer's householder; also the noun earthquaking. Among the Verbs are bring up (educare), wax on edge, as much as lyeth in thy power, p. 300. The old letten and lêtan are now confused; let (prevent) wrongs to ben done, and let him enter. The verb answer takes a new shade of meaning; answer to God (as to your life), p. 295. In the same page there is put to the law; whence comes our "put to school." There is the Adverb cursedly. Among the Prepositions is by the waie (obiter dictum), p. 298. Among the Romance words are advancement, theame (a preacher's text), to return writs, to forfeit, probable doctors, gentleness (mildness). Shoreham's acordant to now becomes according to (secundum); this was to replace one sense of after.

There is a sermon against Miracle plays, dating from about 1390, in 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' ii. 42; here we see the Genitive their and the Accusative hem. The e is inserted, for the old hidous becomes hideous, p. 54. There is the phrase japynge stikke, which paved the way for laughing stock. In p. 44 stands have the greet mynde to do it; mind expresses voluntas; we here substitute a for the. In p. 50 is the new phrase hard of bileve. We see make a play therof; to layke enterludes had come earlier. The Participle being had very seldom been used, since the old wesende had been dropped; we now have "it stands in beynge devout, p. 57; this Participle was henceforth to be used freely after certain prepositions. The whereof stands for the Latin opes; to han wherof to spenden, p. 54. Among French words stands synguler, p. 47, opposed to a plurality, where we should say single.

About 1390 certain parts of the Church ritual were translated into English; these may readily be recognised as little altered in the Anglican Prayer Book of our day. What follows is taken from the 'York Manual' (Surtees Society). The 'Cambridge Manuscript,' which I transcribe, is referred to in p. xiv. The parts of the ritual, done into English about this time and later, were certain bits of the Marriage service, the Great Curse, the Visitation of the sick, and the Bidding prayer for all conditions of men. This was nothing new; in the 'York Manual' may be found an English Bidding prayer, compiled before the Norman Conquest.

In p. 24 the following address is made to the bridal couple:—

"I charge you both and eyther be your selfe, as ye wyll answer before God at the day of dome, that yf there be any thyng done pryvely or openly betwene yourselfe, or that ye knowe any lawfull lettyng why that ye may nat be wedded togyder at thys tyme, say it nowe or we do any more to this mater.

"Here I take the N to my wedded wyfe to have and to holde at bedde and at borde, for feyrer for layther, for better for warse, in sekeness and in hele, tyl dethe us departe, if holy kirk it will ordeyn, and thereto I plyght the my trouthe.

“With this rynge I wedde the, and with this golde and silver I honoure the, and with this gyft I dowe thee.”

I add a Southern version, of about 1400, from a Sarum Missal; see p. 220 in the last part of the ‘York Manual.’ The woman has already promised to be boxom to the man:—

“Wip this ring y the wedde, and this golde and sulver y the seve, and wip my body y the worschipe, and wip my worldliche catel iche þe sese.”

I add a few documents of this date from Blunt’s Key to the Prayer Book:—

“I bileve in god, fadir almygti, makere of hevene and of erthe: and in iesu crist the sone of him, oure lord, oon alone: which is conceyved of the hooli gost; born of marie maiden: suffride passioun undir pounce pilat: crucified, deed, and biried: he went down to hellis: the thridde day he roos agen fro deede: he steig to hevenes: he sittith on the right syde of god the fadir almygti: thenns he is to come for to deme the quyke and deede. I beleve in the hooli goost: feith of hooli chirche: comunyng of seyntis: forgyveness of synnes: agenrisyng of fleish, and everlastyng lyf. So be it.”

PREIE WE. FOR THE PEES.

“God of whom ben hooli desiris, rigt counfels and iust werkis: gyve to thi servantis pees that the world may not geve, that in our hertis govun to thi commandementis, and the drede of enemys putt awei, oure tymes be pesible thurgh thi defendyng. Bi oure lord iesu crist, thi sone, that with thee lyveth and regneth in the unities of the hooli goost god, bi all worldis of worldis. So be it.”

“God, that taughtist the hertis of thi feithful servantis bi the lightnyng of the hooli goost: graunte us to savore rightful thingis in the same goost, and to be ioiful evermore of his counfort. Bi crist our lorde. So be it.”

“Almyghti god, everlastyng, that aloone doost many wondres, schewe the spirit of heelful grace upon bisschopes thi servantis, and upon alle the congregacion betake to hem: and gheete in the dewe of thi blessinge that thei plesse evermore to the in trouthe. Bi crist oure lord. So be it.”

In these last prayers the form Goddess borde is always occurring for the altar. In the Prayers of the 'York Manual' the d is again inserted, as advocate. There is the new verb to fader children on a man, p. 121; Chaucer's new fraunches (liberty), and to present a church. In p. 123 there is a Bidding prayer, something like that used at the Universities; but the phrase we shall pray is employed; not ye.

There is an office for the Visitation of the sick, which dates from about 1390, p. 110, towards the end of the 'York Manual'; this office has a Southern tinge. In p. 111 the priest, when exhorting the dying man, uses the common oath pardé, and moreover quotes Cato; there is the new phrase I despeir of it.

The Church, brought face to face with Lollardy, was now making full use of English as an instrument. Mr. Maskell has printed a very long English Primer, dating from about 1400.

The book of travels, attributed to Sir John Mandeville, used always to be placed at the head of New English prose; but from this place it has been deposed since Colonel Yule lately showed in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' that the book is nothing but a compilation from well-known authors, made about 1390, with the addition of later inventions and interpolations. Thus, the Pope is placed at Rome a little before 1360—a manifest blunder. Manuscripts of this work (some of them have a Southern tinge) abound in our libraries. I have used Halliwell's edition. The Verbal Nouns are many, as in the North. In p. 127 the Northern whare is used in a dependent sentence; here an earlier Southern writer would have used there. Orrmin's theirs has found its way to London, and there is also hires (illorum) formed in the same way. The Infinitive follows an Adverb, as in the 'Cursor Mundi,' it is to fer to travaylle to, p. 270. The en of the Infinitive is often clipped. The Passive Voice, as in the 'Ormulum,' is making great strides, see pp. 2 and 286. The forasmuch and al be it that of Western England have now reached London; such a word as formajour reminds us of the ending used in the Severn country.

We see both Maur and Mowr, where we now write Moor. The French royaume becomes reme and rewme, showing the double sound of au. If that combination here has the sound of the French ou, it has the sound of the French â in bawme and pawme. The a replaces e, as marveyle for merveille, p. 272. The e replaces a, for knowleche stands for the former knowlage; the pecok of the Alexander is found, as well as pocok. But the e is preferred to Hampole's o in mevable and flete; reed supplants the old reod, p. 189. In p. 35 we read of the Bedoynes, where the o and the y must be pronounced separately, as before in Boys. The o replaces e, as in oldest, p. 30; it replaces a, as felowe, p. 24. The u is preferred to its rivals i and e in the Plural rushes; it replaces o in chuse (eligere), p. 221. The Kentish quod becomes goude (bonus), p. 126. There are Severn forms like fuyr, juyce, conduyt. Fown (fawn) stands for the French faon in p. 290.

As to the Consonants, the u was so often mistaken for a v, that the plenteuous of Hampole is here found as plentyfous, p. 187. On the other hand, the v is here taken for an u; efete becomes ewte, p. 61, our newt. The c was replacing s even in Teutonic words; sinder becomes cyndre (cinder) in p. 101. The old læce (hirudo) is seen as leche. The gh is well established instead of h and z; we find sleighte and chough; it seems not to have been sounded hard, for the slow of the 'Havelok' is written slowghe (occidit), p. 141. What had been before written ure is now hour, p. 235. The t is struck out in the middle of at do, p. 132, where the old Danish Infinitive is used as a Noun; have ado with. The th is added at the end; brede becomes our breadthe, p. 41; this must have been an imitation of length. The d is inserted, as had been the case with thunder; aln (alnus) becomes eldre, p. 93. The l is inserted, for the old specca (macula) gives birth to spekelede (speckled). The s is coming into vogue; it is added to form the Genitive of lady; it is added to the old sithen; and sithens, on the road to our since, is found in p. 299; the Preposition besides is in p. 44. Middel is changed to myddes (midst) in p. 2.

The French form sc appears ever in Teutonic words, as scithes (tempora), p. 289. The n is changed into m; random is in p. 238; the n is thrown out, when Amyas, p. 108, is written for Amiens. The Northern fashion of writing x for s is seen once more; we find both Emaus and Emaux, also Jexabel.

Among the Substantives are many new proper names, as yet little known in England, such as Prestre John, Cathay, Russye, Prusse, and Crako, p. 130; Polayne, Slesie, and Bulgarie, "that men clepen the lond of Bougiers," p. 6; the Barbaryenes dwell at Marrok; the Janeweys (Genoese) are in p. 23. There are new words like Fadirhode, applied to the Pope, p. 315; seylle zerde, striplyng, a lad thin as a strip; lyver is formed from the verb live, p. 139. The ending ness is employed to form new words, as in Yorkshire; there is gretnesse, p. 297, which drove out the old micelness (except in our phrase "much of a muchness"). The old much is supplanted by Trevisa's phrase a gret del before a Comparative Adjective, see pp. 51 and 284. We see squareness, roundness, simpleness. There is the new Noun herberghage (harbouring), p. 97; a Teutonic root with a French ending, like the old bondage. We read that the Tartar soldiers gather in a plomp, p. 252; this seems to be the source of our clump, with the well-known interchange of c and p. The phrase hoping to have is changed into in hope to have, p. 280. In p. 277 goeres and comeres are mentioned. In p. 278 a conduit rennes milk, a use of the Accusative something similar to that used in the year 1098. The nobles are described as alle the gode blood of his Reme, p. 154. We see hors back at p. 58. The Verbal Noun syttinges is coined to express the Latin sedes, p. 106. In p. 49 stands thei ben grettere cheep; this last word is a Substantive in the Dative, here meaning bargain; it was 160 years before we began to use cheap as an Adjective. It is remarkable how often our author throws aside the old Genitive, and uses the periphrasis with of, such as nekke of a colver; we follow his example when we write for the press, but not in speaking. We may safely foretell that "the man's dog" will never be replaced by

“the dog of the man.” In p. 273 stands the goynge down of the sonne. We find here two forms of speech that have been embodied in our Bible; most fairest (Most Highest), p. 279; and holy of halwes (Sancta Sanctorum), p. 85. Heaven of heavens had been a good English phrase in the earliest times; and we still use heart of hearts. There is the phrase an hool (whole) moneþ, p. 134. The Superlative forme fader was so little understood that it was now altered both into foremost fader, p. 303, and into formere fader, p. 2. In p. 183 we hear of a worthi (bonus) man, a new meaning of the Adjective. Our author is fond of discarding the old Comparative, and of using the periphrasis with more. The Superlative is now sundered from the Genitive Plural that should follow it; we see in p. 237 the grettest of dignytee of the Prelates.

As to the Pronouns; in p. 122 as for the tyme (“for the present”) is found, where the seems to represent this.¹ The indefinite it is repeated; it came to the ende of nine monethes, p. 27. In p. 3 stands the new phrase of this age, a man that hathe whereof (opes); we now talk of the wherewithal. In p. 287 we have the curious form suche an on (one); the writer little knew that he was here using the same word twice over. The ordinal Numeral takes every prefixed, as in Hampole: every thrydde pas that thei gon, p. 174. We saw in the ‘Cursor Mundi’ þar es na mending þe stat; the use of the na or no, standing for not, is now extended; in p. 102 we find no gret ryvere. The phrase no more did I stands in p. 221.

As to Verbs; the old Imperfect, following that, in a dependent sentence, is sometimes altered into the Pluperfect; and this novelty has taken root; in p. 79 stands sche wende that he had ben a gardener. The Infinitive follows a verb of progress; nails growe to ben longe, p. 310. This tense is governed by certain other phrases, as, are in purpos for to visite, p. 4; to that entent to maken men beleve, etc., p. 160. This Infinitive is replaced by that with the Subjunctive; as, to that ende and entent that his dethe myghte ben knowen, p. 2; we now say, “in order that.” In p. 191 stands in case that he had ony werre. We saw in the 'Cursor Mundi' fall upon a gret (fletus); this gives birth here to he felle preyeng to oure Lord, p. 87; where the on, which should be the third word, is dropped, and the Verbal Noun seems to be turned into a Present Participle. The phrase "fall a praying" lasted almost down to 1800. In "they left beating of Paul," it is hard to say whether beating is a Participle or a Noun; these words in ing are the hardest puzzle in the English tongue. We have already seen, in 1280, the phrase without coming, an imitation of the French; this is carried further in p. 181; afre goynge be see, . . . I have founden, etc. There are such phrases as fall in a rage, lay sege, take the ayr, do reverence to, make hem to beleve, fall sick, lost labour, to bete down and tomble walls (p. 95). The verb sting had hitherto been used as freely as our pierce; it seems henceforth to be restricted, at least in its physical sense, to animals that give wounds; see p. 286. The phrase crepyng bestes is used in p. 296 for our reptiles, and something like the former stands in our Bible. A noun gives birth to a new Participle in p. 137; men are now swerded, now daggered. The old Strong Verb suck now makes a Weak Perfect; thou soukedest is in p. 30. The Active Participle may stand, as in p. 59 of my Book, without an accompanying Noun; we read in p. 191 he takethe on, and another, and so forthe contynuelle sewyng (following).

The Adverbial phrase in the last example (it dates from Old English times) is repeated in p. 309; here 5, here 6, and so forthe; we often substitute on for the last word. We find how used almost as a Relative; I schalle devyse 3ow . . . the names how thei clepen hem, p. 53. The old nu had always expressed quoniam; we see in p. 122 the origin of our now that; now afre that I have told, . . . I wille turnen, etc.; we should here drop the after. Layamon had made a distinction between as and so; his order of words is here reversed; righte als the londes weren lost, so schulle thei ben wonnen. A wholly new way of expressing the Latin nisi, replacing the old but, now starts up; in p. 184 stands that may not be, upon lesse than wec mouve falle. This, the future unless, is a literal version of the French à moins que; a few years later, the upon before the lesse was to be dropped. The evere more sithens, in p. 299, paves the way for our ever since. The but had been used to English quin after possum, in 1300; this usage is now extended further in p. 50; that feld is not so well closed, but that men may entren. The old overall (ubique) was beginning to drop; in p. 46 the contree is strong on alle sides. In p. 309 men rejoyssen hem hugely; this Adverb remained in use for about 300 years, when it yielded to vastly.¹ The Superlative Adverb gladlyest is in p. 195; and beste belovede in p. 177. We have seen the Old English adverbial same swa; this now appears in a slightly different form; they don in the same maner as the firste, p. 192.

Among the Prepositions at is used to express distance; toward the Est, at 160 paas, is Templum. The Adverb overthwart is turned into a Preposition, p. 57; overthwart the See, much as Cowper used it. Under is applied to measure; undir the age of 15 zere, p. 278; here within had been employed earlier. The confusion between of and on is remarkable in p. 115; so much in lengthe, so much of brede (breadth). We saw make game of in 1290; we now light on make cheep (bargain) of hem. A remarkable phrase stands in p. 41, withouten castynge of of hire clothes; this castynge must be the Verbal Noun, not the Infinitive, as in the 'Tristrem.' Our modern off and of, the Adverb and the Preposition, here stand side by side; the old form ofcasting would have been much better than this castynge of. The about now stands for juxta; abouten Grece there ben many iles. A very early idiom is continued in the phrase multiply by 360 sithes, p. 185; there is also for the most partye, p. 294.

The new words akin to the Dutch and German are mosse (muscus), scleuder, schokk (acervus),² whippe, huske, chop (secare), lodesterre. We hear, in p. 130, of carres that have no wheeles, that thei clepen scleyes; this last is the Dutch sledes (sledges).

From the Scandinavian comes lepe zeer (hlaupar), p. 77. The Celtic dagger also appears.

As to French words; bestaylle, p. 284, is the parent of the Scotch substantive bestial. Many adjectives are used as substantives, such as necessaries, tributaries. There are phrases like gret nombre of folk; gret (much) peple; with on accord; double sithes (times) more; it is (so much) in kompas aboute; ordynance of werre; ¹ sue for a thing; to companye with; women refusen a man; savynghe here (their) reverence; a three-cornered city (Constantinople); make it to ben cryed. There are the two forms, French and Latin, obeysant and obedient; since 1390 we have made a difference between obeysance and obedience. We have seen dam applied to a hen, soon after 1300; it is now applied to a mare, p. 302. We saw trail in 1303; we now light upon the noun trayne, used of a fox burrowing a hole, p. 267. In p. 236 avys seems to add the meaning of consilium to that of cogitatio; this is repeated in Gower. In p. 93 conseille stands for an assembly; it was long before we spelt council differently from counsel. We see that part is encroaching on deal; here (exercitus) gave way altogether to hoste. The words of science (here spelt scyence) employed are many; in p. 234 we find no less than four ending in the Greek mancy, which reminds us of the frequent words with this termination naturalised nearly 300 years later. The word hostellere, p. 214, is applied to the landlord; in the next Century it was to be somewhat degraded. The French ending your (eur) is so much in favour, that form-your, not former (Creator), is written. The author explains streyt, p. 45, that is to seye narrow; in p. 266 he uses both this French word and the Teutonic streghte. The word estate means condition in p. 151; it means dignity in p. 218; our quality partakes of these two meanings. Multiply becomes intransitive in p. 158. The noun march is used in p. 171 of "a day's journey;" in p. 6 one country marshethe to another; the Scotch would now say march with; have a common boundary. The old mesel is now making way for lepre. In p. 130 we are told that there is good land, but it is pure litille; here pure is used as an Adverb, like the Teutonic clean. The vitaille of Manning now becomes vitaylles, p. 130; we still keep the French sound of the first syllable, but we write it victuals in the Latin way. We hear, p. 131, that in the country to the East of Russia, every man has stewes in his house; here the French estuve (the Dutch stove) has been followed. French and English words are united in surname, p. 112; and there is something similar in for partie (fore part), p. 107. The verb entreat stands for tractare in p. 95, and keeps this sense in our Bible; in our time we use it in the later sense of precari. The foreign passing had been used in 1303 as a synonym for beyond; this again appears in our author; and he, moreover, employs this Participle both as an Adjective and an Adverb; for the passynge love that he hadde, p. 89; men holden him righte passynge old. By the year 1525 we had substituted exceeding for passing in all these senses. In p. 84 Julian is styled "a renegade" (renegade); this has given birth to the strange form runagate in our Prayer Book. The delitable of Hampole becomes delectable, p. 155. In p. 71 we hear of the Charnelle, where bones lie; the form charnel came into English use before carnal. The author thinks that a strange French word in p. 67 needs explanation, tribe, that is to seye, kynrede; so in p. 199 lymons, that is a manere of fruyt. The French form, not the Old or New Italian, is followed in writing Gene (Genoa), p. 54. The phrase in comparisoun to is substituted for the old preposition to, p. 219. In p. 45 we hear that one place is the distance of five moneths journeyes fro another place. The new tent, here used, was soon to drive out the old teld. In p. 181 we learn that 60 minutes make a degree. In p. 168 reysynges seems to stand for the French raisins (grapes). In p. 14 the Emperour of Almayne is mentioned; his true title was now and henceforward a puzzle to Englishmen. In p. 4 we hear of temporel Lordes, and elsewhere of Marquyses. Our author uses merveyl as a Verb, p. 283. The word bill, well known in Parliament, appears in p. 172. We see here the words deflour, ryzs (rice), multitude, corrour (courier), tablett, oriloge, tysseux (tissues), superscripcioun, eysement, cotoun, equytee, vyaunde, apparayl, lax, congele, eleccioun, devide, climat, prenosticacioun, ambassadour, cylour (ceiling), centre, visibly, superficialtee, egalle, Antartyk, reconsyle, carre, bordure, frankencens, graff, alom, oratories, censer, addiciouns, lamentacioun, habitacioun, goulf, Wlcan (volcano), attendance, apotecary, sophisticate, moysture, cyrcait, finally, and the French word for mingere.

Among the letters printed in the 'Records of the Priory of Coldingham' (Surtees Society) we light upon what is, I think, the first letter written in English; this is due to King Robert III. of Scotland suddenly dropping his usual correspondence in French on 22d April 1390; there are a few other English letters of the same date.¹ Our "he can do no less" is foreshadowed in we can nocht wytt quat he sull do lesse than mak hym obedience, p. 67. There is a coupling of pronouns and substantives in our wille and þe mennys (hominum), p. 60, differing from the form in the 'Ancrén Riwe.' We find among the verbs have in remembrance, putt (call) in questioun, to hald harmeles, God have yhow in keypyng, make hym demaundes, the said John; this last is an imitation of the French. The mon, Orrmin's mun standing for shall, now expresses oportet, p. 67, as it had done in Lancashire rather earlier. The Infinitive, preceded by at or to, follows have, a verb that here means trahere, not possidere, as in 1160; we had (him) at spekyn wyth the bychop, p. 67. Anent bears its old sense of de in p. 60, but in the same page anente yhowe takes the further sense of quod ad te spectat. One of the oldest meanings of by is continued, be ony thynk that we can wyt (for aught we know), p. 67. Among the French words are the addresses, Reverent fadir in Crist, richt honorabyll fadyr in Crist; our principale (the king). There is the French noun ferm (farm), used for a piece of land, p. 65; the Old English feorme had been long disused.

The beautiful Lancashire poem, called 'The Pearl' (Alliterative Poems, Early English Text Society), seems to date from about 1390; it has certainly a far greater number of French words than are to be found in the poems of 1360, printed along with it. The old Adverb grovelinge loses its final e, and thus, seeming to be a Participle, led the way to a new verb 200 years later. The most remarkable change in spelling is that defyle supplants both the Teutonic fyle and the French defouler, a change that was not to become common until a century later; we see undefylde, p. 22. The old trone makes way for the classic prone, p. 34, a remarkable proof of the new influence now at work. In the same page we read of a person's loke3 (looks), a new Plural phrase. The word knot gets a new sense; a knot of women, p. 24. In p. 27 we see the lamb's name, hys faderez also; here the noun name is not repeated after the second Genitive. The Adjective scharpe is applied to a shout in the same page; hence our "sharp cry." We hear in p. 6 of a girl's fygure fyn; the adjective came into greater vogue throughout the next Century. Among the Verbs are bete her wings, bend to a thing (incline myself). There is the new phrase the sunne is down, p. 17. We see the Scandinavian brunt (ictus) clot (gleba) flake, rasch. Among the French words are pyony (peony), synglerty (singularity), query, signet. There is in respecte of, p. 3; here meaning "in comparison with." We have the phrase þe mo þe myrre, used of heaven by a redeemed spirit, p. 26.

To the same dialect belongs the Legend of St. Erkenwald, printed by Horstmann in his 'Altenglische Legenden,' p. 266. The former eggetol becomes eggit tole (edged tool), p. 267. A man is said to work strezt (rectè), p. 272; a new sense of the Adjective, which was brought South by a man of the West Midland district 200 years later. Among the Verbs is lum, p. 272; also bete oute (abigere), bete down, drop dede, syttle upon causes. The new Romance words are metropol (applied to London, p. 266), to embelice, in pontificals, macer (mace-bearer), librarie, the providens (of God), a deputate, declyme (pervert), comarund peace (where an Infinitive is suppressed). In p. 272 limbo is used—a curious leaning to the Latin Ablative case; out of limbo, the place on the border of hell.

The poem on the 'Constitutions of Masonry' in England

(printed by Mr. Halliwell) may date from 1390 or thereabouts. It seems to be a Salopian piece; we see uche (quisque), ellus (else), hennus (hence), resenabul (reasonable), huyre, hure (hire), kette (secare); there is both mechul and mekel. We see Myre's word fell (sapiens) repeated. There is the Northern gate (via), and the East Midland nim (ire); the latter, not for the first time, travelled westward from Derby.

The old eo becomes u; we see duppe (profundus), and buth; leaf is altered into luf, p. 28, though it spoils the rime. There is the old Severn peculiarity which prefixes i or y to another vowel: zeke (etiam) stands in p. 23, and zese (otium), in p. 17; there is zevery. The d replaces þ in dar and Adelston, who is credited with the foundation of thys curyus craft of Masonry in England, after it had been invented by Euclid in Egypt, p. 14. We see fowrtethe, p. 28, our fourteenth; here the older English form of the Numeral has been kept. There is a remarkable change in p. 17, the on (unus) is written won, just as we sound it; a great difference is now made between an and one; this w before o was long peculiar to Salop and the neighbouring shire. The old socour is altered into söker, p. 28, much as we accent the word.

In p. 28 the Mason's craft is said to be fayr and fre. A few years later the word free mason (superior, or master builder) was to appear, preserving one of the senses of the Old English free (potens, dominus), like free-stone.

In p. 35 we have me (man) schal rede, a very old form lingering in Salop. In p. 25 stands to serven uchon othur; in 1340 a the had come before the last word.

Among the Verbs we find pik teeth, thyn enyn (eyes) water. In p. 15 victuals go (are sold) for so much; a new sense of the verb. The verb meddle, in p. 20, adds the sense of sese immiscere to the old miscere. In church a man is ordered to pulle uppe thy herte to Crist, instead of the more common pluck up; hence, perhaps, "to pull a long face." In p. 16 a man is bonde (bound) to his lord; hence, "to bind a prentice." In p. 34 we learn that a church is made to pray yn; this is the true Old English construction, though many would now prefer Orrmin's corruption, to be prayed in.

Our with had expressed apud in the 'Cursor Mundi;' it is now applied to a prentice, who is with a master, p. 22. We see at these prayers, p. 13, imitated from the French à. The between is used in a new sense, implying combination; two men are advised to amend something, bytwynne 3ow bothe, p. 21.

There is the Scandinavian *smogyng*e (smudging), and snyft (sniff).

There is the French verb practese. In p. 23 a mason takes his pay, the first use of the verb as a noun; in our days a Queen's officer talks of his pay, a man of lower stamp of remuneration. In p. 31 we have the English lawe and the French lay (lei) in the next line. In p. 22 the mystery of the craft is hinted at—

“The prevyté of the chamber telle he no mon,
Ny yn the logge whatsoever they done;
Whatsoever thou heryst, or syste hem do,
Telle hyt no mon, whersever thou go.
The counsel of halle, and 3eke of bowre,
Kepe hyt wel to gret honowre,
Lest hyt wolde torne thysel to blame,
And brynge the craft ynto gret schame.”¹

In p. 38 stands Bishop Wykeham's renowned watchword in Midland English, not in the Southern form we know.

Many rules, bearing on nurture, are given in pp. 37-40. A famous proverbial phrase, common in England about this time, a phrase to remain alive until 1654, stands in p. 39—that is, “had I known the consequences I would not have done the deed.” The prentice must abstain from making this silly excuse.

Gower, after having written long pieces in French and

Latin, brought out his 'Confessio Amantis,' in English verse, about 1393. His work is of a more Northern cast than Chaucer's, and is therefore in some respects easier to read. The poem is said to be due to Richard II., who called the poet into his barge, and asked him "to booke some new thing." Gower has many words and phrases, used by Chaucer a few years earlier, such as womanish, adieu, guerdon, porte, our home-coming, to fire, wait on him; licour becomes liquor.

As to Vowels, the a replaces e, as jargon and quarele for Chaucer's jergon and querele (rixa); there is also the verb rase (our race) for the old ræsen. The old beorcan (latrare) makes its Perfect in bark, i. 221; whence comes our present form. The former fela3schip is cut down to felaship, the accent being thrown on the first vowel, ii. 26. The a replaces i, for aliche (similiter), not iliche is found; also along on (per), the ilong of 1270. The e replaces eo in swerve. The French ei is slurred over in forfet, iii. 177. The o replaces ea, as in rover (pirata), i. 359; the Sallee rovers were dreaded down to our own Century. The o gains upon the e, as in reprove and move; there is also reproef; on the other hand, rekever stands in iii. 346, with both lest and loste for perdidit. Gower makes joy and Troy rime to monaie, ii. 147, 188; he uses Gregois for what Orrmin wrote Grickes. Trevisa's form Lewis is repeated; our duty is spelt both as deute and duety; there is also bellewing for bellowing. The French ou supplants the English e in flat-rour; a change often occurring in the next hundred years.

Among the Consonants we see the insertion of the b in the old doute, ii. 21; Gower leant much to the new French forms, and France had some years earlier begun to fall back upon Latin, in the matter of spelling. Her great light, Oresme, who died in 1382, had used doubte, effect, congneu, dessoubz, for doute, effet, connu, dessus; ¹ our Edward III. in his State Papers had employed traictier (tractare) for the old traiter, and Juyll for the old Juinet (July); he wrote also cognoissant, with the g inserted; Marcz for Marz, the month ; and forms like tiegne (tienne), Acquitaigne, ordeigne, with the needless g.¹ So in this Century the French altered fantosme, Manning's fantome, into fantasme. This new love for classic forms was the first dawn of the Renaissance, to the North of the Alps ; Petrarch's teaching was bearing fruit. The p is therefore by Gower often inserted, as in concept, decept. We have not followed Chaucer's kembed, though we stick to Gower's unkemt ; see iii. 260. The c supplants s in fierce, which we still keep. The c is inserted, in imitation of the Latin, in practique ; the French always wrote pratique. The g is inserted in restreign, in imitation of the new French style ; there are also ordeign, pigne (pine) ; Ariadne appears as Adriagne, ii. 306. Our curious participle destraught is first found in iii. 84, where a French word is forced to take a Teutonic form ; geste is altered into jeste, iii. 307. The l is inserted in the French sauvage, which has to imitate the Latin and become salvage ; also in outrage, i. 345, following the Latin ; we now make a difference between an outré dress and an ultra man ; our form realm also appears, supplanting roialme and reaume. The n is struck out, for Barbour's on wry becomes awry, i. 174. There is also the Shakesperian a colde, iii. 35. The m is inserted, for stefn (puppis) is written stempne, i. 312 ; we still say, "from stem to stern."

Among the new Substantives are workmanship, topsail. In ii. 41 a lady makes a technical change in a word by taking in hand her werk of embroidery. Skie still means nubes as well as cælum ; see ii. 50. The Old English rád (iter), and the Dutch rede (statio navium), are both expressed by our road ; the first word now adds to its old meaning the sense of hostile intent, ii. 56, where a knight makes rodes into Tartary ; the Southern road, called by the Scotch a raid, still remains in our Bible. The word inn keeps one of its oldest meanings, domus, in ii. 218 ; like our Lincoln's Inn. We see also a very early meaning of spellinge, ii. 263, connected with the black art. In iii. 4

braine takes the meaning of sapientia. In iii. 257 a guest claims to be cousin of house, a new sense of the last word. Two pages further on, a woman swooning is said to be dede oppressed, oppressed by death; hence our dead lame; we saw ded wo so early as 1270. In iii. 278 weight gets the meaning of importance; in iii. 287 lette signifies hindrance. In the phrase leave his herte there, the noun gets the new sense of amor. In iii. 305 a lady is asked to write her owne honde; hence our "write a good hand." In iii. 87 we find, not only the noun being, but also its Plural beinges. Teutonic words continue to favour French endings, like mordrice (murderess), sheperdess, michory. In ii. 34 the Sun is called the "carte of Phebus." In iii. 6 we see Chaucer's word hovedaunce. The new expression ladyship is freely used; it here means "womanly dignity;" ladyhede is also used for the same; in ii. 59 her ladyship is clearly used for her worshipful person, a turn of phrase that had just come in. So in ii. 19 a priest is addressed as your fuderhode, an imitation of the Latin. There are expressions like breche of pees, make warde and wacche (true English alliteration), with bow in honde, it is a shame, an aventure (case) of life and deth, upon the blind side. As to proper names, Wickliffe's corruption is continued; Delphos is used as a nominative, ii. 163; a fault that lingered for 300 years in England;¹ there are also the new forms Chio, Cateline, Pompey, Antioche, Tire, Ephesim. We hear of the filbert tree, ii. 30, that it was called philliberd after Phillis. The general name Jack, little known before 1340, is now used for a man, as in ii. 393; a good felaw is Jacke; we still say, "every man Jack of them."

There are new Adjectives like firy, false-tunged, evil-mouthed, odde or even, iii. 138. The less is tacked on to foreign roots, as vertuless; in iii. 110 a man is lustles (invitus) to travaile; hence the listless that came up forty-five years later. The old word for puerilis, the English knightly, is now applied to rank, i. 184. The sely is used in its common sense, miser, i. 301 ; but in curious contradiction it plainly means felix in i. 225 ; a sense which lasted forty-five years longer in Norfolk ; this fact seems to prove Gower to have had some connexion with East Anglia. There are phrases like cole black, brode day, ready wit, pouer as Job, siker as the crede, fast aslepe, rightfull heire, sing lich an awngel. We have seen fair fall you ! Gower gives us foule him falle ! In iii. 263 we see long time er he was bore ; here we now drop the substantive. An adjective is sometimes supplanted by another phrase ; thus in i. 366 stands a foule of pray (predatory).

Among the Pronouns, we see somwho, i. 15, formed after the pattern of somwhat. The old idiom as who saith is constantly coming. The which is employed as a Masculine and Feminine Relative, as in the North-West ; the king which understood stands in i. 154 ; there is also she, which. An as is tacked on to this Relative, any word which as I shulde holden, i. 298. There are the phrases an other suche as, upon that, in alle haste, I be none of the wise, with all his hole herte, one of all the best, ensamples many one, se any thinge of her, by alle wey (means). The word self is employed after a Genitive, as person is now ; my ladies selve, i. 228 ; on the other hand thy persone is used for thy self in iii. 79. The word one had been placed after a Positive a hundred years earlier ; it now stands after a Superlative, as the wisest one, iii. 314. A phrase of ours, own brother to, is foreshadowed in i. 307 ; there is a kind of wrath, whiche is to cheste his owne brother. In ii. 349 comes if I be min owne man (have the use of all my faculties). There is the curious pleonasm I am that ilke same, i. 323. A man is asked to say something in i. 322 ; he answers, and that I can ; here an Infinitive do is dropped, as we saw in 1350. We see halfe in wrath, iii. 267. The use of most before Adjectives had lately been revived ; Gower uses least in the same way ; the lest worth of alle, iii. 260.

There are new Verbs, such as mistime, frend (befriend) ; also new senses given to verbs, such as to cross sail, i. 81 ; smite coin, overtorne (turn over) books, fret him selven to nought, spare him selve, clepe up (call a man in the morning), have it

(hear the news) by revelacion, ride on anker. Verbs change their meanings; thus the old werian (induere) gives rise to the intransitive were out, i. 16. In i. 262 the verbs wrong and righte are both made intransitive; we still say, "the ship righted." The old gader (colligere) undergoes the same change as in Barbour; see i. 308. In ii. 351 men stele and pike, a phrase in our Catechism; in ii. 90 they pike her wordes. In i. 53 we hear of a king who first upset (set up) Thebes; this sense had appeared in Lincolnshire; the verb has with us gained an exactly opposite meaning to this. There are phrases like lay him low, set eye (on a thing), take lore (knowledge) of it, i. 303; make werre, take pity of, keep his time, keep his holde, take travail (trouble) to ride, put himselve forth (forward), lay aside, do the message, do sacrifice, make sacrifice, make a speche, make suit after it, ii. 274; take the possession, kepe her chambre, the brid is flowe, ii. 335; have it in honde, go the pas (pace), speke it out, take logginge, take his place (seat), kepe his tunge (word) to speke pleine, have a fall, say plate (flat), cacche who that cacche might, give answeare, cast anker, do the cure. In ii. 370 men hove nigh the weder; we say that they sail near the wind. The it is set before seems, as it semeth to me, iii. 9. This it followed by a Relative is employed to add great emphasis; as, it was of her that they thoughten, iii. 18. The Past Participle is followed by the Infinitive; joies made to last, iii. 242. The Noun and Past Participle are compounded together in wind-drive (driven); this sort of union we saw revived thirty years earlier. The Active Participle is used like an Adjective, how hindring a peine is, i. 310; something like this had appeared in 1220. Trevisa had written "bring with child;" Gower has "beget with childe," iii. 50; here we now clip the be. The verbs come and go are here used like Reflexive Verbs; he comth him home, iii. 50; he goth him forth, iii. 53; much as we say to come it and go it. The phrase see far is used in iii. 251 of a man's mind. A foreign Noun is turned into a Verb as, they ensampled hem, iii. 241; for they took example. We say, "what must be, must be;" Gower put it more elegantly, nede mote that nede shall, iii. 309; five pages later comes all that shall falle, falle shall. The old may still keeps can at bay, as in it may nought be, iii. 330. The Passive is developed in goddes ben beleved, ii. 152. There are the new phrases, full growe, there ne here (here nor there), whereas (in the sense of ubi), i. 335; as certainly as I shall die, as sikerly as the life (as sure as life), iii. 74; so fer (up to this time), ii. 33; on that other side (contra), now and efte (again), als fer as he can here. The that is dropped in i. 263; for drede he schulde, etc. A chief warns his men by and by (protenus), ii. 386. The as is constantly prefixed without any need, as in Chaucer, as therof he was deceived, iii. 266. The adverb, as in Chaucer, is prefixed to the verb; away goth dish, down goth the bord, iii. 302. The now is used as a Noun, ensamples of now, iii. 346.

The Preposition of is much developed; we find of kin, of record, of his owne chois, of one accord, she was of the chambre (court), it is of none emprise (use), iii. 252. We further see, in i. 205, two persons so clothed, as to be of a suit; we may here remark the a used instead of one. The to is also used in imitation of the French à; a woman is arrayed to the best, i. 101; here we should now add the word advantage. There is privy to, in imitation of the Latin consciuis, which sometimes governs a Dative. We have seen turn into; we now have grow into, i. 60. To spend on a thing had come earlier; we now see waste thy wit upon it, i. 329. The old ilong on (per) is made by Gower alonge on, ii. 22; it thus became confused with the old andlang, and is now all but gone, in polite speech, after being supplanted by owing to about 1720; there is some difference between walking along a river, and a flood being caused along of a river. The old æfter had always been set before nouns to form compounds; in ii. 32 we light on an after-cast, the parent of our afterthought. The Old English for and the French pour alike expressed quod attinet ad; we have here the new phrase for his partie (part), iii. 289. There are the two variations, redy at his honde, and redy to his honde, ii. 198, 296; the latter is in Chaucer. The with supplants an earlier for in a favourite idiom of ours, what wip hepe and what wip croke. There is a new use of before in iii. 335, where a ship sails to fore the wind. There is the Interjection away the tyranny! i. 263; this first word is Frenchified into avoy, iii. 312; Lydgate's avaunt was to come later.

The Scandinavian words first used by Gower are bask (the middle verb baka sik), bait (esca), down (pluma), gasp.

The words akin to the Dutch and German are riff (reef of a sail), raile (paxillus); also the verb moor. There is the Celtic block and to pall.

Among the many French words are memorial, courteour (courtier), regiment (imperium), usher (ostiarus), rosin, client, arrivaile, ungentillesse, to traunce (trounce), affiche, fixation, genius, misrule, epitaph, entaile (our intaglio), phisonomy, in effect, plover, mathematique, reptile, calme, morgage, stalon (stallion), she was professed as abbess, iii. 337.

In iii. 340 culprits are atteint by the law; but in this instance there seems to have been a fair trial first; the technical use of attaint was to come sixty years later. The Teutonic be is set before a French root in the verb befole, i. 10, like Orrmin's bicache. The for is treated in the same way; a man is forjuged wrongly in iii. 192, like forfeind. Gower uses feverous, where we have feverish. The verb fortune (fieri), which we have already seen, is repeated here. A noun is formed from the verb await; hate is ever upon await, i. 311; we know our Scripture phrases lie in wait, and lay wait for. A man's body is awaited (tended) by his cooks, iii. 22; here there is the change of meaning already seen in Chaucer. We see the verb quarel with; here riza encroaches on querela. In i. 134 the verb address all but gets the new meaning of vestire, and is used along with its sister array; a lady's attire is wel adressed in iii. 255. The word fairie is used for a personage and not for a realm, in ii. 371; this sense was never borne by the word in France. It is said to be honourable to a king, when all doubte his justice, iii. 189; the word has with us all but lost this sense, timere, which it bore in France down to Molière's time. In iii. 200 estate shows its meaning of right of possession; his estate of his regne. In iii. 271 comes the phrase he serves to tempt; here the first verb means is on duty. A storm scarses in iii. 313; hence our make himself scarce. The modern form of magister is now extended to shipping; we hear of the maister of a ship, iii. 335. There are also French naval terms, such as caban and porte, our port-holes; see i. 197. Spices are said to be restauratife, iii. 30; a foreshadowing of our restaurants. The au is much used to give the broad sound of the French a, as decevaunt, attendaunt; Gower is fond of the French Active Participle. He loves the latest Parisian ways; for he has a dieu, helas, bienfait, culpable, Juil (July). There is a very French idiom, he was arrived to, in iii. 202. The Teutonic utterly appears as oultrely, iii. 230. An earthquake is called a terremote, a word of Gower's own coinage. The Greek pseudo turns up in ii. 190, for falsely; as in Wickliffe. The Greek z comes well forward, as in enthronize; our printers would now substitute s. It is a great change when graunt-dame, i. 90, replaces the Teutonic ealdmoder; this last was to linger for fifty years longer; the French was making inroads even on the English hearth; aunt had come a hundred years earlier. There is a change in counseil, for it may now mean a lawyer; see iii. 155. The verb pass is employed in a new English sense; pass the night, i. 115. The transitive verb plie is used for flectere, i. 274. In i. 130 traitors are discovered out; hence our found out. The old cwite is revived after a long sleep, and is spelt in the right French fashion; he wente quite away, ii. 23. The French pure is used for exclusively in iii. 38; of pure fear; Chaucer had often used purely for omnino. It is said of a child, iii. 77, that masters entend to him; an old French sense of the word; the use of this verb and of attend was most unsettled for the next fourscore years. We see the new phrases double as moche as, iii. 103; and double more than, iii. 214.

In the year 1393 we find an English will, made by John of Croxton of York, who styles himself chaumdeler, the French ch now supplanting the old Latin hard c ('Testamenta Eboracensia,' Surtees Society, i. 184). The old Elaine now becomes Elyn, our Ellen; and Mold or Mald appears as Maulde, whence soon came Maud. English trade surnames are making way ; we hear of Johan Goldsmyth, with no the before the last word. There is another, Alison Smalbane, a proper name derived not from the trade, but from the body. We read of an Ankres and her mayden ; the last word was henceforward to be used for ancilla. We hear for the first time of a dede, in the sense of a legal document. Later on comes "if there be oght over ;" the last word, here an Adverb, is used for the first time as a synonym for remaining ; this we owe to the form overplus. Twice appears the phrase in kase be that, etc. ; the first word seems to be confused with if. Among the new French words stands coverlet ; there is also the onder clerk, formed like Layamon's underking. We read of a leg (legacy).

There is another Will of 1395 ('Earliest Wills,' Early English Text Society), where we see parker, the man who looked after the park ; whence comes an English surname. The Romance words are materas, baillif (to a landowner), divine service, age of discrecioun. The lady who makes the will talks of myn harneys in connexion with her chariot, p. 5 ; a new sense of the word. There is my secunde best bed, p. 5, reminding us of the Northern Barbour.

In the Political Songs of the year 1395 (Master of the Rolls, vol. i.), we see ducke substituted for the old doke, p. 330 ; to soupe sorrow comes in p. 337. In another piece of 1399, in vol. i. 363, there is the phrase the bothom is ny ouzt (out, that is, fallen), a new use of the adverb. In p. 364 stands he is ronnon (run) away, a new construction.

In the State Papers, printed by Rymer, we remark among those of 26th October 1398 that the Latin item stands at the head of paragraphs ; there is also the adverb particularly.

In the paper of 28th October 1398 we find a surplus of goods, not overplus ; of purpose, where we now substitute on ; at the lattast (latest).

In the paper of 6th November 1398 there are endenturs madz, where the Passive Participle imitates the French and becomes Plural ; also purvait (provided) that, a preference of the French to the Latin.

In the paper of 25th July 1400 mention is made of thes presentes, and of letters patentes.

We may now cast a glance at Gregory's Chronicle for the years 1397, 1398 (Collection of a London Citizen, Camden Society). The one year 1398 occupies as much space as the previous twenty years; hence we may perhaps conjecture that the Chronicle of this time is the work of a contemporary, copied out by Gregory himself some forty years later. We see them as well as hem for illos; thei had forty years earlier replaced hi in London. We find Harry constantly used for Henry or Herry, referring to the future King Henry IV. The form indeu is preferred to endow; we have also resydeue. The ending ful is now added to dout, and produces doutfulle (awful), used of a King. The French words are procter (procurator), also written proctoure, blanke chartours; a Prevy Conselle is held by the Lords; enjorne (adjourn), procede ayenste. The title youre royalle mageste is applied to Richard II.; there is humbyll (humilis). We hear of Powlys Crosse, p. 98.

In the Rolls of Parliament for the year 1397 we find Rickhill's report to the Crown, with the Duke of Gloucester's confession, p. 378. Richard II. is spoken of as his heygh Lordeschipp; there is the foreign word sedule (schedule). In the year 1399 Chief Justice Thirnyng, who deals much in Romance words, gives judgment upon certain traitors, p. 451. He must have been a Northern man, as he uses kyrk, mykel, þof (quavis), ilkon, þos same, that is atte (to) saye. There is the new combination any state whatsoever; the phrase upon whiche is often used to begin sentences. The Past Participle Ablative Absolute (Lydgate was fond of it) was now beginning to come in fast; tho herd (illis auditis). The form bysydes (not the old biside) appears for the first time as a Preposition; bysydes the Record. There are many French words, as appel, cancel; simplych is used in our sense of the term. We hear of the hegh Court of the Parlement; also of the King and all the States in this present Parlement; this is the first hint of the Three Estates. There is the phrase he was nereve partie to it. We find another harangue of Thirnyng's in p. 424; he uses rewelers for regulars, speaking of the clergy ; he talks of barones and banerettes, and then of a lower class, bachilers and commons. He uses the awful verb depose (it was rather new in English) when addressing the unhappy Richard II. ; he has also Gower's it is of record ; the cession was agreed ; here we should add a to. In p. 423 we find Henry IV.'s well-known challenge of the English crown ; he says that the rewme was in poynt to be undone for undoyng of the gode lawes ; here undo bears both its old sense of solvere, and its new sense, first seen in the North, of perdere. So speedily did new words and meanings make their way to London.

Many English vows of chastity are to be seen in 'Testamenta Eboracensia,' iii. 316, and onward ; in one of these, of the date 1398, the Archbishop of York is called worshepful fader in God.

Hallam gives us, in his 'Literature of Europe,' i. 54, the first of English familiar letters ; it was written by Lady Pelham to her husband in 1399 ; she calls him "my dear Lord," and has "I recommend me to your high Lordship," a phrase which she repeats ; she speaks of the shires, meaning their inhabitants.

Dr. Murray's Dictionary affords a few new words of this time, as in kenebowe, whence came akimbo ; the adverb ably, and the botanical name agnus castus, the forerunner of many such Latin terms.

In September 1399 the author of 'Piers Ploughman,' a poet of nearly forty years' standing, wrote a leef oper tweyne (as he says) against the fallen king, Richard II. Alliterative to the last, he called his new work Richard the Redeles ; much as an earlier English monarch had been branded as the un-red-y (inops consilii). In one line, so low had the king sunk, he is addressed with pou, not ye, p. 473.¹

The poet gives us our form borugh (borough) in p. 469, applying the word to Bristow, where he wrote these lines ; this is an advance on the buruh of 1170. He has both the forms axe and aske in p. 486. He uses the new word hob, p. 477, as it would seem, for juvenis ; hence our hobbledehoy.

There is a pun in p. 479 ; Richard marked the breasts of his servants with hertis (cervi), his badge ; the servants oppressed and disgusted the common folk ; hence

“For one pat 3e merkyd, 3e myssed ten schore
Of homelich hertis (corda).”

There is a further play on the verb merk, which means attingere as well as signare.

We have already met with the Danish odd ; it now stands for supra ; “faults fourscore and odde,” p. 472. We had long used the adjective dul ; we now, in p. 490, light upon dullisshe ; this Chaucerian ish we still add in careless speech to old adjectives, like fairish, baddish. The homely no longer means familiar, but something that makes no pretension to elegance ; honest and simple as the dress worn by Wisdom in p. 493 ; so also in p. 479.

Among the Verbs we find trouthe to telle, put in his power ; also the Passive idiom (they), were behote (promised) hansell. Some Prepositions are used as Adverbs ; thus, in p. 474, mysscheff was up, like our “there is something up ;” in p. 476 comes hervest is ynne.

Prepositions are employed, somewhat on the old lines, in the quotation already given ; for one you hit, you missed ten ; here the idea of exchange comes in. The from replaces for or by (per) ; ffrom 3oure willfull werkis, 3oure will was chaungid ; hence comes the later from internal evidence, from what I hear, etc. We see in p. 487 the phrase sese on her sete ; the French saisir governs the Accusative, and the intruded on revives a very old English idiom, implying hostility.

There are the Scandinavian verbs flush and strut (tumere), the former is like our blush ; fflush for anger, p. 484. In the same page we read of poor men’s pulter ; this is the Swedish paltor (rags), whence comes paltry.

Among the French words are deabolik and beu, the French beau. In p. 482 rasskayle is used of inferior deer ; in the next page it is applied to common people ; a baser meaning was to come later. In p. 492 stands the noun devyse, referring to fashion ; we now keep devise for wills, and write device for the first-named sense of the word.

The it had often been placed before Teutonic impersonal verbs; this is now beginning to be prefixed to their French brethren, as in Chaucer; it greved him stands in p. 471.

We read of the renowned lawe of Lydfford in p. 491, something like Jeddart justice; a poet 200 years later wrote—

“I oft have heard of Lydford law;
How in the morn they hang and draw,
And sit in judgment after.”

The Camden Society have printed a book under the title of ‘Apology for the Lollards.’ About the year 1400 a Latin book of Wickliffe’s was done into English by a writer, who would seem to have been a Cheshire man.¹ He has certain peculiarities common to him and the Salopian author of the poem on Masonry; thus they both set w before o, as won, wold (vetus), and even the Romance wordeyn (ordain); they set z before e as zerle, zeke, zerd for herd (p. 59); there is Myrc’s ask banns and need lore; the new form een (oculi) is common to both; also prestus (priests); there is the Salopian haply and chepherd (pastor), p. 67. But the dialect in this book is much more Northern than that of Salop; we see I is (sum), nor, stern (stella), tan (captus) þof, aboun (super), anenst, farrer, kirke, reif (spoliatio), I schal ordeyn, p. 12, where a promise is made; tayste (taste); tuk (took), blud (blood). There is the Lancashire word dreamreader and the Salopian witness (testari).

As to the Vowels, the Latin o is written for the old French u in honor, p. 3; the American way of printing the word. The oi is sounded like the French ê in denoy; in the ‘Introduction,’ p. xi., we see woois (our woes), showing how o and i, in a Teutonic word, as well as in Boice, were beginning to compound a new sound. There is polute in p. 53, and the more English sound polewt in p. 36; we see also presewme.

As to the Consonants, de is clipped in true Northern style; the debate of p. 26 becomes bat (bate) in p. 29; we now give to each form its special meaning. We also see the loss of n in dinging (ictus); at p. 5 this is written diging; hence our dig in the ribs. On the other hand the old cuician now becomes quekenen, p. 50.

There is a love for Teutonic endings, as parisching for the old parishen (parishioner), pornes (poverty), and fersness. The Verbal Nouns abound, as his forbeding to worschip hem, p. 85; form of using of lawe, p. 15; þe putting upon of hondes, p. 33; þi going forþ (proficiency), p. 33. In p. 22 Lincoln stands by itself, meaning the bishop of that see. We see the new phrase lawe zefar (lawgiver). There is a curious instance of the change of meaning in words (it had already appeared in the neighbouring Lancashire) in p. xv.; wittes had been used as a Plural in the 'Ancren Riwle,' standing for the Five Senses; in 1360 this word in the Plural had begun to be used of the mind; we now read that clerks know of five wittes outward and other five wittes inward. In our day the wits of the mind have left no room for the wits (senses) of the body.

Among the Adjectives we meet with some used as an ending; drunkunsum stands in p. 54; noisome was to arise at York about this time, and I have often heard hindersome in Scotland. In p. 25 stands ivil willid, showing how self-willed was formed later. We have unrestful formed from Wickliffe's unreste (inquiries). We see unsteakable used in p. 75. As in the 'Ayenbite,' there is a curious Comparative like compendiosar, p. 75.

Among the Pronouns it may now refer backward to a long sentence; in p. 41 an offer is made to Christ in ten words; he fled it. The such also, probably translating the Latin ita, has a backward reference in p. 25; to be cursid and haldun swilk, p. 25. In p. 17 a man is not to reste hemsilf siker; this Reflexive Dative imitates Layamon's sit him still. The relative Which often stands as first word; this came from the Latin, here, as in the 'Ayenbite,' it came from the French. The translators from the French, as a general rule, threw aside their pens, much about the time that the translators from the Latin set to work; English has been steeped in foreign idioms, unknown to Orrmin and Layamon.

Among the Verbs we see the phrases put questiouns, waxit (grown up) folk, have place, 3ef zere (give ear), hald togidre, do beft, tak occasioun, lay to hert, beg his liflod (living). The verb better had meant prævalere in 1250; it is now used transitively, as we employ it, p. 19. In p. 24 men are blawun (maledicti) in Church; perhaps this led to our blow up (vituperare). We saw in 1303 the Imperative, have done (finish); this is carried a step further in p. 20; have done cursing, where the last word is an Active Participle. The transitive verb wrong is formed from the noun in p. 64. We saw score (ratio); the verb formed from this, meaning imputare, is in p. 85. The Active Participle is here made a Superlative; bitandist (most biting), p. 105.

We have seen Chaucer's use of considering; we now find seing þat man is not, etc., p. 21; this idiom, imitated from the French vu que, etc., is much employed in the 'Chester Mysteries,' fifty years later; this fact gives us a hint as to where the 'Lollard Apology' was translated. There is the phrase no wey (in no wise). Layamon's oper þene now becomes oper wyse þan, p. 47. The old Northern English negative, such as gesella oper nô, is now altered; beneficid or not is in p. 52; wan scho erriþ and wan not, p. 99. In p. 100 stands we are not so sikir þat; where so takes Chaucer's new sense; we still say, "I am not so sure of that." The however is now first prefixed to an Adjective, as how ever litil.

Among the Prepositions we find under þe autorité, under þe peyn of.

There is but and if at the beginning of a sentence, p. 49; a Western form long afterwards repeated in our Bibles (Matt. xxiv. 49).

In p. 103 we read of a consciens iren broudit; this verb brand is akin to a Dutch word.

The Latin idioms abound, especially that of the Accusative and Infinitive; so in p. 8 it is evident him not be þe vicar; it is don þat (fit ut), for price zevun, cruciar (cruciator) of þe same sentence (opinion), at God (apud Deum), unþankful (ingratus), unnoble, unknaw (nescire), unevenly (iniquè), in-call (invoco), zeve peynis, at his instaunce. Sometimes there is a downright mistake, as þe ordinaunce of þe good memorie of Leoun (Leo of good memory), p. 39; wel ze not be maad (nolite fieri), p. 97. We find minys (minish), effectuali, it distinguish, poynnt of dep, absolute, scysm, potentat (not potestat), exort, assine, pompous, novys, representacioun, despens wip, enduce, ruyn, chefly, stigma, degrade, augur, to calcule, aniversary, precell (excel), transcend, quyschin (cushion) to favor, solempnize matrimoyn, explane, materialy. We see enpliz, p. 3 (employ), implye, p. 63, ymplizeply, p. 17 (impliedly), impliz, p. 77 (implicate); this is a good example of the struggle in English between the Latin in and its French corruption en. In p. 4 stands the phrase contrarily directly. The word pité is no longer here used, as by former English writers, for misericordia; but it represents pietas; impius is translated unpitous. We see our version of the French partager in p. 12, in part takyng of; a most curious instance of the confusion between Teutonic and Romance forms. A righteous man, following the Latin, becomes a just man, p. 13. There are compounds, such as dowble-tongid. Latin Plurals are Englished, such as prices, merits, marblis. To convict, p. 39, means simply to prove; we have greatly altered the verb's meaning. In p. 50 we see conventiclis, a word fifty years later applied to Lollard meetings, and further on to those of other Dissenters; in this passage it means meetings for plotting crime. In pp. 95 and 96 the different sorts of diviners are named, most of them ending in mancer, as geomancer. When we see langering (languishing), p. 93, we understand how readily a lingering disease came in. In p. 52 we read of conduct (hired) prestis; the two clergymen who perform service in Eton chapel are still called conducts. The form temporal supplants the timely of the 'Ayenbite,' p. 108. In p. 70 we have ratify, and also rate, the latter as a synonym for stable; we now make it a substantive. The Church laws, in p. 75, are divided into incorporat and extravagant. The Latin provisiones are translated batails, p. 76; hence come the battels at our Universities. We have pagaynis formed at once from the Latin, no longer the French paens or paynim. In p. 100 the three different senses of the word religion are given—

- I. þe trowþ þat rewliþ us to serve God.
- II. þe state procedyng of þis.
- III. þe personis þus enclinid.

The Romance of Ipomydon, dating perhaps from 1400, is to be found in Weber, ii. 281. It was evidently compiled not far to the South of Rutland; we find nor, nat, and indede, all used by Manning; also those, gainsay, busk, till (ad), hers, wel farand. On the other hand, the Southern forms are traceable; we find the lines, in p. 285—

“Kyngs and dukes comethe hyr to seke,
And so done emperoures eke.”

There are besides, moche, kusse, n'as, sith.

Among the Adjectives we see mydille age, bare-handyd, sekir to wynne.

As to Pronouns, we see be ye he? In p. 286 stands she will non (no man); a terse idiom.

Among the Verbs we find myne herte ys sette upon (it), pluck down, take his sete. There is the phrase undo my tente, p. 343; and also, undo (dissect) deer, p. 295.

Among the Adverbs is found a shortened version of the upon lesse that of the Mandeville treatise; in p. 339 nisi is Englished by lesse than. The as, not so, was now representing one of the oldest functions of swa; as thou arte kynde, . . . abyde! p. 322. In p. 55 not yit (pas encore) forms a whole sentence by itself, in answer to a demand.

In p. 330 stands the phrase lordis were plenté. We have seen that Manning clipped French words, as stress for distress; in p. 303 of the present piece we find sporte for desporte. There is quarter, applied to a year, p. 308; “my greyhondes raune not this quartère.” The Spanish phrase en un tris is translated in p. 295; they plucked down deer all at a tryse (in a trice).

The poem on the Nun (‘Early English Lives of Saints,’ Furnivall, 1862) may date from 1400; and may come from Lincolnshire, as we may guess by the appearance of the nouns myre and mud; there is the Northern mornyng (mane). There is the Reflexive me in I sportyd me, p.

139. We see the new noun selfe wyll; also in trewthe, a new phrase, p. 143; few or none, p. 145. Among the verbs are make my sute (request), have in reverence. There is thanke yow, p. 142, with the I dropped. In p. 147 so hyt schulde seme is repeated. There is the adverb endlesly; the out is placed before a noun, as, an owte chamber, p. 145. We see the Romance adjective pore used in a compassionate sense, pore dame mekenes, p. 144. A well-known by-word is alluded to in p. 147—

 Whyche hangeth at a tavern dore,
 Hyt ys a false token, as I wene,
 But yf there be wyne gode and sewer.”

The poem on the ‘Hunting of the Hare’ (Weber, iii. 279) may date from about 1400; it seems to belong to Cheshire or thereabouts; for we find won (unus), also twold, bwon (boun). We see new forms of proper names; Reginald is seen as Raynall; there is Gybon (Gilbert), Dykon, and Sander (Alexander). There is the new noun whelebarow. The verbs are put up (a hare), lett slyppe (dogs), a man bridles, after a blow, p. 288. The Interjections are the sporting so ho! and hy, hy! There is the Celtic lack (ferire), our lick, p. 285. There is the technical cours with greyhounds, p. 280; we hear of a village constable, p. 287.

Some pieces in Hazlitt’s ‘Early Popular Poetry,’ vol. i., seem to belong to 1400; they are Northern, as tylle enquere (to inquire), p. 156; awheynte (acquaint), p. 184; so in Scotland they write the proper name Cultoquhey and pronounce it Cultowhey. The noun will and verb fret are used in Gower’s sense. There is our word forthought (prudence for the future), p. 192; the old word foreponc, standing for Providence, had died out. The ancient cries wasseile and drynkeheil were still in use, see p. 189. The adjective mody seems to change from the sense of superbus to that of morosus, p. 185; it is coupled with envyous. The wife is exhorted to honour and wurchipe her husband, p. 181, as in our Marriage service. She ought not to curse or blow her children, but whip them, p. 191. She should not be of many wordes, p. 183; and should be more for worschipe than for pride, p. 186; here some word like ready is dropped; Iago tells his dupe, "I am for you;" "now for our sport!"

We find the Danish gegelotte (loose woman); much used for the next 200 years. Among the new Romance words is the old abusive substantive file, written vyle, p. 188; there is the old Northern boner, soon to be driven out by debonaire.

Among the proverbs are "Many handys make light werke," p. 188; also, "Leve childe lore behoveth," the latter dating from 1260.

In the Third volume of Hazlitt's work is the old poem on the 'Smith and his Dame,' dating from about this time; it is Northern, as we see by the verb smore (not smother). We find our common that is a lye, p. 210; where that refers to a previous statement. There is the insertion of a noun in what man of craft so ever, p. 219. We have the new verb throtle, p. 211, formed from throat. The verb hold is employed in two senses; I holde thee dead, p. 216; and her legges wolde not holde (remain on), p. 217. There is the phrase to keep a man (maintain). There is the new phrase there away, p. 202, for thereabouts; in p. 209 come on is used where we should say come along. A man entreats his wife, supposed to be dead, to say once, bo! p. 216. The French words are excellent, thy mayster (thy superior in art), p. 207 (hence the Old Masters); the word beldame is used for mother-in-law, the French belle mère. There is the new phrase give thee a poynt, that is, an advantage, p. 219.

The 'Hymns to the Virgin and Christ' (Early English Text Society) seem to date from about 1400, if we consider the large proportion of obsolete Teutonic. The old English blā or blo (lividus) is now confounded with the French bloie or bleu (cæruleus); in p. 13 stands for beeting was pi bodi blewe, a correct rime in this passage. Among the Substantives are candelis eende; me is lefte but skyn and boon. In p. 53 we read of angels of priis; and a little later of manye a price taken by Lucifer; we now distinguish between price and prize. The word harlot had hitherto been applied to men; in p. 64 it seems to be applied to women, for harlotrie is opposed to clennesse; the new sense was not well established until a Century later, when Tyndale wrote. In p. 71 young folk think that an old man goes in her weie (gets in their way); this is a new phrase. In p. 25 love makes men bope big and bolde; hence our "look big." Among the Verbs are make fool of him; gates break up; put aside things; have it in stoore for them, p. 76; þe choice lies; fall away from. In p. 74 we have he doop him binde suget to me; hence "bind prentice." The Infinitive Active had long been used with for, denoting purpose; appropriateness is now denoted by for followed by to be; course of kynde (nature) is for youþe to be wilde, p. 60. Two prepositions had been coupled 400 years earlier, as in "from beyond Jordan;" we now see from an hize (on high), p. 45.

Among the French words are pockets, which men wore long, p. 62. In p. 50 the accents of forfeit and quarel are thrown back to the first syllable. In p. 61 conscience is scornfully told to preche to þe post; we still say, "I might as well speak to a post." In p. 79 we light upon oolde age, a curious combination of Teutonic and Romance; either eld or age had been used before. In p. 114 we read of something playnli printid in a booke; this is a foretaste of the art soon to be invented. In p. 126 a woman has favour (beauty), the source of "well-favoured."

In p. 61 we read that at twenty years old it was proper to goo to Oxenford or lerne lawe; this age is rather more advanced than accords with our generally received ideas, as to Mediæval studies.

About the year 1400 John Arderne drew up a most plain-spoken account of the cures effected by him; it is in 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' i. 191. We here first light upon fisch-manger; the monger was now coming in as a suffix. In p. 55 stands rubarbe; in p. 257 a woman serves the devil to pay; the verb here keeps its old sense of please; this is perhaps the leading idea in our phrase, "here's the devil to pay!" (some mischief that will delight Satan).

We have the poems that go by the name of 'Jack Upland' and his enemy 'Daw Topias,' dating from 1401 or soon after. These show us the Wickliffites and the Church party facing each other with deadly intent. The works are printed in vol. ii. of 'Political Poems' (Master of the Rolls).

England was now forgetting how her old words ought to be spelt, for undernim (reprehendere) appears as undermyn, p. 84. In Wyelyfan we see the foreign ending tacked on to an English word, p. 92.

Among the nouns there are cardmaker, housing (furniture), gunner, and snek-drawer, p. 98; the last is used by Scott. There is the old wrench (dolus), p. 48; and the new wrynkel with the same meaning, p. 45; this is still in our mouths. The heretical disputant is hailed as Jacke boy, p. 62. There is the name Tymothé. We have still a phrase like the latter part of the following: I know not an A from the wynd mylne, ne a B from a bole foot, p. 57.

Among the adjectives we notice a fatte benefice, sturdy beggyng, and Wickliffe's blynde buserde.

Among the Verbs we find make more ado, where the last word, the Northern Infinitive at do, seems to be turned into a Noun. In p. 86 stands bere hem hevvy, where we should now say, bear hard on them.

Among Prepositions the for continues one of its old meanings in for this mater, p. 96; the forerunner of our for the matter of that; the word had meant causa in France in the Twelfth Century.

We see a word akin to the German in the phrase to sterch (starch) faces, p. 50.

There are the Scandinavian tateris and tagges, applied to dress, p. 69.

Among the French words are cuteller, forme (of a school), half a doseyne, to sette to ferme. The Church, Lords, and Commons are called the Astates, p. 54; not States, as two years earlier.

English was now making rapid strides; in 1402 we come upon a letter written by the Prince of Wales to his father Henry IV.¹ He uses the Northern thaym (illos) and I trowe, though he has the Southern Participle do (done).

Writing to the King he recommends himself to your good and gracieux lordship; and calls the King your hynesse, and Sir. The old swipe (valdè) had now made way for another adverb; we hear of right a tal meyny; we now transpose the first two words. The King's great ship was named the Grace Dieu. The most startling change is that the old Plural opere (alii) is turned into others; the true old form is sometimes seen in our Bible; we have never distorted the Plural some in the same way. In the above change we have a real specimen of King's English. Henry's language is far nearer our own than is that of Pecoock, fifty years later.

Many of the 'York Mysteries' seem to have been written about the year 1400; I have already referred to the earlier ones at page 78 of this book. We here see some new words repeated that have appeared in Barbour and the 'Apology for the Lollards.' A change may be remarked in the sound of i or y, bringing it almost to the sound of French ê; betwyne is made to rime with clene, p. 9; chyned stands for chained, p. 279; Hampole's contreve (controuuer) becomes contryve, p. 288; denay, p. 434, has not yet become our deny. There are the distinct forms payn and pyne, p. 329. The b is added; lim becomes lymb, p. 212. The h is clipped; hosteler (inn-keeper) becomes ostler, p. 491; and the word is explained in a rather later hand as meaning inholder. The d is clipped in bune (vinctus), p. 262, which is a rime; we see how easily boune (paratus) and bound (vinctus) might become confounded. The ȝ is sometimes written for þ in later copies of the manuscript; hence we see how you came often to supplant thou, pp. 177, 458. The r is added, as hover for the old hove, p. 53; this verb is not yet applied to birds. The r is docked, as chatt for chatter, p. 320. We see the French bewe Sirs, p. 291; this becomes bewshers, p. 254, a favourite Yorkshire form; another instance of sh replacing s is the verb pussh (pousser); this is connected with the English verb push, p. 481.

Among the Substantives is the new fortheraunce, with its Romance ending, p. 221. Two forms for senectus appear, reminding us of the varying forms of the word in Old English ; Elizabeth could not in elde consayve a childe for alde, p. 99. The old cunde (natura) is coupled with another noun, a very late instance ; Christ takes mankynde (human nature), p. 175. There is the Vocative my man, addressed to an inferior, as in our days, p. 213. Pilate is greeted as your lordshipp, p. 324, a new title of honour ; there is also mi lorde ser Herowde, p. 128. The word wind takes the new sense of breathing power, Barbour's aynd ; a man after hard work says that me wantis wynde, p. 355. The Virgin is called the belle of all bewtes, p. 487 ; the first noun must come from the earlier phrase, to bear the bell (highest prize) ; this bell, about 1700, was perhaps confused with the feminine of beau. The Jews are not to be marked with pat messe (plague), p. 77 ; this rimes with encresse, and the later "get into a mess" may perhaps be derived from this form of the old misse (defectus, injuria). The Northern love of Verbal nouns is once more seen, when oure saffying stands for salus, p. 115. As to Adjectives, the old word rank was preserved in the North ; see p. 220 ; hence our "a rank traitor." The old dæfte (conveniens) seems to take the meaning of sapiens in p. 4 ; Satan prides himself on being defte. We have seen Trevisa's unfitting ; the word fit here takes the new meaning of congruus ; I am fygured full fytt, p. 3 ; our "fit as a fiddle" was to come much later. The adjective even is opposed to odd, p. 465, as in Gower. As to Pronouns, Pilate addresses his wife with the courteous ye, p. 272 ; this was not the usage among the lower orders. There is the emphatic the ilke selve and þe same, p. 296. The that is employed for the sake of emphasis ; my worthely wiffe, þat sche is ! p. 271. A lady is called þat faire one, p. 489 ; Shakespere was to be fond of this. The word clock is dropped, as in Chaucer, when reckoning time ; aftir tenne, p. 263.

Among the new Verbs is saunter ; the un is prefixed, as unmade ; þou onhanged harlott, p. 313 ; there is the new to outcast, whence Coverdale was to form a Noun. There are the new phrases, go wode (mad), cast lead (at sea), take tent to, draw to ende, spille sporte, p. 265 ; play fair, be harde stedde, hedge the law, p. 439. We have seen thou may as well, etc., in the year 1300; in p. 48 stands pou were als goode come downe; and this idiom is repeated in p. 351; we now drop the be before as, and say, I as good as, etc. A pair are gone in eelde (age), p. 57; hence our far gone. The verb ken meant scire in the North, p. 116; in the South it nearly always expressed docere. Language is laid out, p. 230; we now confine this verb to money. We use I am afraid, when softening down some evil; in p. 244 stands I am ferde ze mon faile. The verb balk becomes transitive, meaning to put a balk (trabs) in a man's way; balke youre bidding, p. 255. The Participles sittand (decens) and unsittand are found; there was doubtless a confusion with fitting and unfitting. The words I telle you stand at the end of a sentence as an assurance, p. 288. The mean takes, not an Infinitive, but an Accusative; to mean malice, p. 290. The verbs clap and chop both meant ferire; they each took the further sense of ponere; choppe þam in cheynes stands in p. 293, and clap was to bear the same sense a hundred years later. Herod wishes that his false God giffe you goode nyght, p. 294; the first instance, I think, of this greeting. The verb blow takes the new meaning spirare, p. 297. A person is rowted (knocked about), p. 325; this seems a confusion between hrutan and rouse; hence comes our roust up. The verb settle adds to its old meaning of taking a seat that of descend, p. 328; it is here used of a spear shaft; our architects know too well what is meant by a settlement. The verb were had hitherto been a Weak Verb, with its Participle wered; this is now turned into worne, p. 331; a most unusual change, found afterwards in Wyntoun.

There is the new Adverb dayly, p. 219, which is Northern; also the answer, wel þan (well then), p. 328. The so has a backward reference; a man is told not to be taynted; he answers, why shuld I be soo? p. 328. As to Prepositions, something is done under þer nese (nose), p. 463. A person is laid on lenthe, p. 370; here we now substitute at; the usual endelang was dying out. An old meaning of by (secundum) is expressed in I bide þer-by (stand by my word), p. 362. There is the Interjection tussch! p. 324, which took a hundred years to reach London. Pilate, when pleased, cries howe ! howe ! p. 272, much as Caliban was to cry ho ! ho ! when gloating over an evil deed. Herod begins a sentence with saie ! p. 297 ; it seems here to stand for I say ! The cry wassaille is used, p. 268, simply to make a noise. There is owte allas ! and loo ! Sir, behalde, p. 82, the parent of lo and behold ! In p. 269 stands the devell have þe worde he wolde tell us ! (devil a word) ; we saw before sorrow occupying the place of devil. There is the Scandinavian adverb skantely.

Among the Romance words are pagiaunt (pageant), cat-terak (cataract), uncertain, unison, regent, mony-changer, certify, purlain, construe, to fashion, to noise, patter, transgression, indignacioun, recreacioun, reduce. Lucifer, when overthrown, cries owe ! dewes ! (deuce), p. 4 ; the first time, I think, that this cry has occurred for 120 years. There is commoder (fellow mother), p. 49, whence the Scotch cummer ; this is an early instance of co prefixed to a Teutonic word. In p. 129 dresse bears the meaning of vestire. In p. 197 rule is connected with common life ; we will be ruled aftir þi rede, like our "be ruled by me." In p. 222 store takes the sense of merces ; merchants sell their store. Judas, in p. 225, is called the purser (purse-bearer) ; the word was to bear its naval sense a hundred years later. In p. 281 the chief rulers are called the States ; this Northern phrase recurs in Wyntoun. The verb tax gets the new sense of accusare, p. 316 ; and the verb clear seems to mean absolvere, p. 332. The verb save, as in Chaucer, means "pay careful attention to ;" in p. 360 it is used of the Jewish Sabbath. In p. 131 the French stable (stabilis) has ousted the Old English stapel. In p. 201 a village still appears under its very old Biblical name castell. The verb warrant is used without an Infinitive ; I warande hym wakande (that he is waking), p. 268. The some was a favourite ending for Adjectives in the North ; newsome (noisome) stands in p. 277, and this ousted the Southern noyous. There is the new verb taint, from tingere, p. 328. The word principall is used as a Substantive, p. 378, as in the Scotch letter of 1390 ; it was later to be connected with a college. Reference is made to the devyll and his dame, p. 300. Herod and Pilate use many French words, such as bene-venew; there is the Vocative mounseniour, p. 293; also my seniour, p. 273. The cry oyas! for silence is made by the beadle, p. 285; The aged Simeon is called a senyour, p. 435. These later 'Mysteries' are distinguished from those of 1360 by the use of the new adverb doutles; moreover, the stanza here is more easy and flowing than in the earlier plays; it abounds in good rimes, see pp. 229, 232, 263; I give a specimen of the new Anapæstic style now coming in:—

“ Now wightly late wende on our wayes,
 Late us trusse us, no tyme is to tarie.
 My lorde, will 3e listen our layes?
 Here this boy is, 3e bade us go bary ” (p. 334).

Many of the trades, to whom these pageants are due, appear for the first time in the list given at p. xix.; we here see the plasterers, cardemakers, armourers, irenmanagers, turnours, payntours. Some trades, which bore French names about 1400, were rather later Teutonized; thus the gaunters, pepsoners, orfeyvers, sellors, and verrouers, were to become the glovers, fysshmongers, gold-beters, sadellers, and glasiers; this is a change contrary to the usual run of English custom.

A character new to our stage appears in Dame Percula (Procula), Pilate's wife, p. 271. Her airs and graces, and Pilate's doting love for his charming spouse, are most amusing; it is curious to remark the wide interval that separates this early sketch from Lady Teazle.

The 'Towneley Mysteries' (Camden Society) were compiled in Yorkshire, probably at Woodkirk, near Wakefield; some of them are but slightly altered from the 'York Mysteries.' The work may belong to the date at which we have arrived; the fashionable lady of the age is described as "hornyd like a kowe," p. 312; and this usage came to England not long before the year 1400; it must have taken a little time to find its way down to Yorkshire.

There is an attempt to engraft the Southern English upon this Yorkshire piece; in pp. 124 and 141 there is evidently an alteration of a into o in the rimes; we also sometimes find mych, sich, ich a. There is lifing as well as liffand. We find strong Northern forms and words like at do, hand tamè, wage (merces), travel, scalp, scald, I spyt (I spat), lad, not bot; and Wickliffe's expletive I gess, p. 194. The old seven (pactum) is found here, and has lasted in Yorkshire till our own day, though it vanished from the South after 1400. The first hint of English hexameters is found in p. 233—

“Nomine vulgari Pownce Pilat, that may ye welle say, Qui bene vult fari shuld calle me fownder of alle lay.”

We may remark here that the last vowels in welle and alle were not sounded in the North. The counterpart to the well-known Italian saw, chi va piano va lontano, is found in p. 195—

Herod refers to the Pope; and Cleophas when welcoming our Lord to his board, swears “bi Sant Gyle.” In p. 88 we hear of the fools of Gotham; in p. 25 a man is to be clad in Stafford blue. The whole piece is a good commentary on the idioms found a hundred years earlier in the ‘Cursor Mundi.’

As to Vowels, the a replaces e in marvel, tar, hart, share (partiri); since 1400 we have made a useful distinction between share (partiri) and shear (tondere); the Old English scer-an had expressed both meanings. We see Janet as well as the usual Joan. The a is clipped in the usual Northern way; in p. 123 stands semled for assembled. The yea or ie takes another form in p. 114, ay so? this form had appeared in Gloucestershire in 1300. There is much contracting of vowels; executors are cut down to sectures in p. 326, and in p. 308 we have stand to fence (defence). The o replaces what was sounded like the old u; we see flo (fluere), and windo; there is also felo for felawe. There is blynfold for the old blindfellede, p. 200; here the verb fold must have supplied a mistaken analogy. The oy, pronounced like the old u, comes often, as shoyes, I doy, noy (nunc); Yoyle (Yule); moyte, p. 179, is pronounced much as we sound “a moot point;” ploy, p. 9, is the Scotch pleugh; on the other hand, the sound of u replaces that of o in booted, p. 194, our booted. The verb indew stands in p. 194; we have both this and endow, proving how that truly Old English sound eu will make itself heard, even in foreign words like vertew, p. 46; the old Yorkshire unto becomes untew, p. 33.

In Consonants there is the same Northern love of contraction; thus benedicite is pared down to benste, p. 99. The d replaces v, for the diveren (tremere) of 1200 now becomes dedir, our dither, p. 28. The th is thrown out in close (vestes), p. 46. The k is thrown out in ast (rogavi), p. 200. The old form twyc (tweak) is seen in p. 220, differing from the Southern twitch; both forms alike were found in Norfolk in 1440. The g is softened when the French Gaspar becomes Jaspar, p. 123; and sawgeoure (miles), something like our sodger, is seen in p. 310. The form wawghes (fluctus), however, remains in p. 31. The n is clipped at the end of a word, for hautain becomes hawty, p. 319; and damned becomes damyd, p. 211. There is the curious Northern habit of sounding kw like hw; we see whake in p. 169, and whaynt in p. 175. Letters are transposed, as in the 'Cursor Mundi'; drit becomes durt, p. 194; and thirl is seen as thrylle, p. 209.

Among the Substantives may be remarked a favourite synonym for man and woman; Sir, for Jak nor for Gille wille I turne my face, p. 28. Mowlle, our Molly, appears in p. 88. It is curious that an n is often prefixed to shortened names in English, as Ned, Nan, and Noll, for Edward, Anne, and Oliver; we see Nelle in p. 313. The Southern Herry becomes Harry in the North, p. 319. The Verbal Nouns still increase in Yorkshire; in p. 10 stands God gifys the alle thi lifyng; in the South liflode would have been used for the last word. In the same page we find my wynnyngs. In p. 220 comes the phrase slegthe (sleight) of hande. The word monger was freely attached to other words, as quest manger; "crochet monger" is our last coinage of this sort, I think, a word most appropriate to our age. A horse is called Don and Donning from its dun colour,¹ pp. 18 and 8; and in the latter page an ox is called Greyn horne, a phrase still in use, though applied to men. We see ram-skyt, p. 25, applied to a woman skittish as a ram. In p. 47 our property appears as oure thynges; cattle are here referred to; something like this had appeared in Barbour. In p. 124 we read that a star is to overcome kasar and kyng, a very old phrase. The Sir is prefixed to other Nouns, even to Plurals; in p. 127 stands Sir Kynges thre. Our many thanks, used without any Verb following, appears in p. 128 as mekylle thank. There is a favourite phrase in the North, I am wo for the! p. 136. The distinction between the English words for cras and mane was not fully established in the North; in p. 172 to-morne is opposed to to-day. Caiaphas, when in a rage, says, "I am oute of my gate;" I have heard a later version of this in the North, "I am put off my beat." The new Noun toyllle (toil) is used for labor in p. 213, coming from tilian, tulien. The first hint of our "up to the mark" is seen in p. 219; get it to the marke; to in the 'Cursor Mundi' had expressed the old oppe (usque ad). In the next page a request is made for something to be done, whils thi hande is in. In p. 323 we hear of a sorrowful bande (turma), a new sense of the Substantive, borrowed from the French; in the next page band keeps its old sense of vinculum. The word mompyns is used in p. 89 for "what we have begged;" Lord Macaulay in his History used mump for beg. The old wærloga had been the term for a fiend in the 'Cursor Mundi,' and this sense is still seen in p. 116 of the present work; but in p. 60 Moses is called by Pharaoh a warlow with his wand, following the new Lancashire sense of the word; hence arose warlock. Fee still keeps its three meanings, which it had borne from the earliest times; in p. 28 it stands for property, catalle and fe; in p. 56 it stands for the kindred Latin word pecus; in p. 192 it stands for præmium. There are new substantives like belle weder, kynswoman, cokker (cockfighter), paddok (toad). A French ending is tacked on to an English root, as wrightry (carpenter's trade), p. 26. On the other hand, dom and ness are fastened to the French caitif. We see the Scotch form carline; the land lepar of Piers Ploughman (Scott's land louper) is repeated in p. 144. Pilate begins his address to the Jews with "Boys, I say!" p. 229. In p. 105 no dred is inserted in a sentence like our "no fear of that."

Among the Adjectives we find tiny, spruce (the material of a coffer, Prussian wood). The old expletive leof turns up in p. 143; nay leyfe, a very late instance. Fair was now adding the meaning of æquus to that of pulcher; trete hym with farenes, p. 195. Strong shows its bad side, as strang tratoure and thefe! p. 149; this throws light upon a passage in Chaucer.¹ The sad has now fully acquired the sense of tristis, at least in the North; an enemy is to be sett bothe sad and sore, p. 249. The word high, when prefixed to time, gets a new sense; it were right hie tyme, p. 36. The phrase by my good grace is found in p. 234. The Plural Adjective may stand without a substantive; St. Peter, in p. 281, addresses his fellows as my lefe deres. In p. 218 comes be ye secure (siker) we were lothe; we should now say, we were lothe, you may be sure.

Among the Pronouns the distinction between the thou and the ye is well preserved; when Christ is tormented before His death, three of the Jews address Him with thou as an inferior; the fourth, more spiteful, hails Him as a King, and employs the respectful Sir and ye, p. 218. In p. 163 Mary talks to Joseph of youre son and myne. In p. 211 we find yond same cyte (that same). We see twyse as fast, p. 62. In p. 283 we have the Relative, I what was wont, etc. Besides this, the what is used like the French quoi in asking for information; what, son? p. 39. The what (que) is used in the old sense found in the 'Cursor Mundi' 100 years earlier; what these weders are cold!

As to Verbs, the must is found much as we use it; the Scandinavian auxiliary mon appears in p. 97; it here still bears a future sense. The strange form we must have biggid stands in p. 309. In p. 54 stands to kepe fro syn; here no Accusative follows the verb, as would have been the case earlier. To dry becomes intransitive in p. 130. In p. 192 the meaning of occupare is seen in the verb take; a certain building toke more aray (work); to take rest is in p. 45. In p. 194 we hear of broken words. We see in p. 201 that was welle gone to (done); Orrmin's go to is well known. The confusion between those very different old verbs, me þyncaþ and I þenc, is seen in p. 232; do what thou thynk gud; there is also I thyrst (sitio), p. 228; I lyst, p. 245; here the rightful Dative makes way for the Nominative. We saw burst on laughter in the year 1303; the idiom is now carried a step further in p. 328, sche braste owt on weping; we now drop the Preposition, and thus we seem to turn the Verbal Noun into an Active Participle; fall a weeping lasted almost down to our own Century. We light upon phrases like eat out of house and of harbar, p. 104; make shift, p. 105; it fell to my lot; my foot slepys (is asleep); how the game goes; the clok stroke twelf, p. 115; to do that is in me; know him by sight; I held my ground; they have no fete to stande (not a leg to stand on), p. 310; we have a craw to pulle, p. 15; take thee that (twice over), p. 17; set no store bi me, p. 22; if ye like; pak up; let them go hang them, p. 142; now how is it? somewhat is in hand; I shall make you men; well done! what commys of dysing? (dicing), p. 243; it goys azans myn hart; I kepe this in store; fon him (make fun of him), p. 199; make or mar a man; keep the Sabbath; hangyd be he that sparis! p. 188; hold thi hand; booted and spurrd; strike a bargain; to come out with it, p. 194; how it stands with you; lead him a dance, p. 205; as trew as ye stand there, p. 281; hold still there! give place; cry and crow, p. 234. A man pipes (sets up his pipe), p. 103; a woman is netyld (nettled), p. 309; there is forrammed (pressus), whence came our verb ram; to deffe (deafen), p. 314; to gad, p. 11, perhaps from the old gædeling; to brane him, p. 142; I widder away, p. 21; the aged Symeon cralls to kyrk, p. 155, the creul of the 'Cursor Mundi' being slightly changed; to overset me, p. 197; to sounnd the water, p. 31; there had been an Old English sundgyrd (sounding line); the expletive I tryst stands in p. 195. There is a strange phrase in the wenyande, p. 241; in the unlucky time when the moon wanes; hence the curse, "with a wanion." We see how do they? (like our how d'ye do?), p. 63, where don (facere) supplants dugan (valere). The verb fare is used in p. 276 both for ire and tractari. To eke (add to) his days stands in p. 324; we cannot now use this verb without adding out. The old wissian (ducere) was evidently dropping out; it is written wishe in p. 121. He votes (scit) stands in p. 168, a great corruption of the old verb; just as some write he dares for he dare. In p. 126 comes the blessing, Mahowne the save and see! the two verbs are often coupled in our old ballads. There is a Latin construction in p. 158, a madyn to bere a chyld, that were ferly (a wonder). In p. 129 comes this is sothe, wytnes Isay; before the last word should stand something answering to the Latin sit.

Among the Adverbs we find he gaf me none, no more will I, p. 11; no more (by itself), p. 149; so have ye lang sayde, p. 151 (here sin or ago is dropped after long); as how? p. 197; that is welle; I wyll lyg downe stright (applied to time, hence straightway), p. 110; up with the tymbre! p. 221. In p. 267 stands thefyshly instead of the old peofliche. In p. 174 stands wille he be there? (is that his intent?); we now say, "a man is not all there" (is not fully master of his wits). We see the new form lately, p. 102, which answers to sero; not to nuper, as we now use it. As to the sentence a pratty child, as sittes, we should now alter it into as pretty a child as, etc.

Among the Prepositions we remark the curse, in the middle of a sentence, with a mischance to him, in pp. 199 and 223. The at is dropped before this tyme of the nyght, p. 106. The for (malgré) is prefixed to a whole sentence in p. 218, for as modee (proud) as he can loke; here the accusative after a preposition is replaced by a whole sentence. The old through makes way for by menys of, p. 82. In p. 200 comes ye are ever in oone taylle, a phrase of Dogberry's long afterwards. In p. 121 stands on assay, our on trial; here the on shows that some consequence is to follow. In p. 296 stands I lefe it you by oone and oone (individually). The that is dropped after a preposition in agane thou go, p. 326. The old prefix for still held its ground in the North, and might be set before Romance words ; in p. 98 stands the Participle fortaxed.

The Interjections are O ho! p. 61 ; Io, which comes into our yo ho, p. 9 ; puf (pooh), p. 14 ; also, in the devillys name, in the same page ; go to the deville! p. 10 ; Herod, when told in p. 126 that Christ is to be king, cries "Kyng! the dewille!" A new idiom connected with oaths appears ; one of his soldiers (p. 150) cries, the devylle have my saulle, but, etc. ; the but here must stand for quin after a sentence like non est dubium. We find out upon the! p. 17 ; lew, lew, the call to animals, p. 33, which we now pronounce like the French lou, lou! There is also mom (mum), p. 194. The so is used as an exclamation in the last line of p. 220 ; ay, so? is in p. 114. There are the forms of greeting, good morne and good day, without any verb.

The Scandinavian words are stag (p. 311), groin, fry (semen), stump, clog, rok (colus), to nip, chappyd (fingers).

The new words akin to Dutch and German are nibble, croon, pranky (gowns), p. 312, stouke (of corn), much used in Scotland now.

There are the Celtic words docket, jagged.

The French words are many. Catalle is used for pecus, as in Barbour ; and this exclusive sense of the word was to come South by 1525. Astate stands for condition in p. 317 ; in p. 104 a man says that his belly is out of astate. In p. 103 a person is said to pipe poore ; the latter word is sliding into the sense of malus, our poorly. The word creature had a loftier sense in 1400 than now ; for St. Peter speaks of his master as that good creature. In p. 11 travelle is used for labor, not for iter. The provand (provender) of horses is mentioned in p. 9. We know the term offices in connexion with a house ; there were in the Ark (p. 23) not only parlours, but houses of offyce for beasts. In p. 65 we read attend my wordys ; this sense comes from the Latin rather than from the French. The old wait, which had meant expectare, seems now to get Chaucer's new sense of servire in p. 194, where Caiaphas has knights on me to wate. Our three substantives "waits," "waiters on Providence," and "waiters at dinner," preserve the three meanings which this French verb bore in England about 1400. Lay and law are both used in p. 189; ye be ataynt (caught) is in the next page; and in p. 191 stands apeche him; we know that some of our modern writers on History find it hard to distinguish between an attainder and an impeachment. In p. 195 stands vex, which now in the South means little more than annoy; in Scotland I have heard the term vexed used to describe the feelings of a mother who had just lost her son; we know the phrase "vex the Midianites." In p. 203 we find that a judge "shews a man fair countenance;" hence arose our verb countenance. The indefinite it was used in Yorkshire as elsewhere; a promise is made in p. 210, followed by the words, I insure it; in p. 230 stands I warand you that, etc. The Yorkshire writer pays more regard to his provincial garth than to the foreign garden when he writes of a garthynere, p. 267. The foreign cease is here plainly driving out the English verbs blyn and stint; there is moreover uncessantly, p. 23. In p. 243 we find by his meanes, a word that was coming in. We see the verbs pant, mock, spite, martyr, pouch. There are the musical terms well toned, treble, breffe, crochett; in p. 118 we hear of the game of the tenys (tennis). There are phrases like I am in dett to, p. 73; I am passed play, p. 75, which reminds us of the 'Cursor Mundi'; furrys (furs) fine come in p. 163. In p. 198 one judge tells another, ye ar irregulere. We find novels new, p. 160 (this seems tautology); to peep.

I may remark, as curious, Cain's curses and revilings, pp. 8-17, and the comic talk of the Shepherds, p. 84, one of the first long instances known of broad English farce. If we read p. 142 we shall gain some idea of the origin of the phrase "outheroding Herod;" it is King Cambyses' vein with a vengeance.

Translations from French Romances had prevailed in England from 1280 to 1380; these are now replaced by English Mysteries and ballads. About this time, 1400, the earliest of the Robin Hood ballads, that has come down to us, seems to have been compiled; country bards were to go to work upon this long-lived theme for the next 300 years; much as King Alfred's saws had remained engraven for ages upon the hearts of earlier generations.¹ The ballad literature of England is one of her greatest treasures. The oldest of these works, judging from the obsolete words, is that of Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne. This was made in the North country; we find words like busk, boun, farli (mirus), fettle, gate (via), and the phrase set store by, used in the 'Towneley Mysteries.' The ballad seems to have been altered about the year 1600; this accounts for forms like I'le, I'm, itt's, reachles on (reckless of), tow (twa); perhaps the two former stand for the Northern I is; I suspect that awkward, applied to a stroke, stands for an original awke (sinister). Some words here found could hardly have been due to the old Maker of 1400, such as pastime, wore (induit), stopp (stare); the earliest Southern copy may have been made about 1500.

The old linde (tilia) is changed into lyne, riming with thine; hence comes our lime. We see prick used in the Shakesperian sense of meta, as later in the 'Promptorium Parvulorum.' There is a favourite phrase of ballad-makers, two howres of a summer's day. Among the Verbs we find breake heads; and Barbour's draw near. The verb nick is used, evidently connected with notch; he nicked him in the face. Robin, it is said, when fighting, came with an awkward stroke; hence our "come in with something." The old better by far is now altered into far better, as in Barbour.

I give a specimen of the fine old ballad, from a part that has been but little altered—

"Fast Robin hee hyed him to Little John,
He thought to loose him blive.
The sheriffe and all his companye
Fast after him can drive.

"Stand abacke, stand abacke, sayd Robin;
Why draw you mee so neere?
It was never the use in our countrye,
One's shrift another shold heere."

I may here remark that the Genitive one's is most uncommon.

¹ I have used the reprint of Ritson, published in 1823.

The 'Rolls of Parliament' for 1402 give us the names of many of our trades for the first time, vol. iii. 519; such as grocer, skinner, lyndraper, saddler, wodmonger, salter, peuterer, founder, cordwaner. It will be remarked that many of these are of Romance birth.

In the year 1411 we have a decision of the Archbishop of Canterbury, p. 650. He mentions the Castle of Bever (Belvoir), the seat of Lord the Roos; the old bew (beau) was now encroached upon by be, and this degradation of ew went on throughout the Century. We light on the new phrase after the fest last passed. A comun man is distinguished from a high official; there is the Adjective sinister.

In the 'Testamenta Eboracensia,' iii. 25 (Surtees Society), we find the will of Sir William Heron drawn up in 1404; he calls Durham The Bysshoprick, a phrase long to last in the North; no other English episcopal see ever stood on Durham's level. We find surveour; also joynly or severally. In vol. iv. 42 we read of a window of three lightes, a new technical phrase. Chaucer's sense of in reappears, when men are bound in XL pound.

In other Wills of this time (Early English Text Society) we see overseer, one who looks after the execution of the will, p. 11; also pipe of wine; the word worsted is now becoming common, p. 19. We hear of a bras pot, p. 22; not brasen. We know our polite phrase for death, "if anything should happen;" this appears in p. 13; yef outgh (ought) come to Thomas, than, etc. The most startling change is in a will of 1411, p. 19; (a sum) ys owynge to me. Here an in is dropped before the Verbal noun; which, therefore, most deceptively, seems to be an Active Participle. I have no doubt that Butler, when affirming that Reformation must still be doing, never done, thought that this doing was a Participle. All this comes from Layamon's unlucky substitution of inge for inde in the Active Participle. In the Will there is the word kylderkyyn, p. 17, from the Dutch kindeken. Among the Romance words are pe utensyl (furniture) of a house, p. 18, remaynder, the companye of heaven, p. 16. The word clerk in 1402 approaches to our common sense of the word; for in p. 11 the parish priest gets ten shillings, while the clerk of the Church and the sexton get only twelve pence each. In p. 18 a Berkshire knight talks of his store and catall quick and dead; here the word may bear Barbour's sense. In p. 20 there are the forms, English and French, leful and lawful; we have also the pleonasm be Counte (county) of Devonschire.

On examining 'Gregory's Chronicle,' between the years 1400 and 1413, we see Wyndesore contracted into Wynsore, p. 107. We hear of the game of hurlyngge, p. 106, and of Troye weight, p. 107. There is a remarkable new idiom in the year 1403; brother and cousin are said to be ayenste eche othyr; this looks as if eche, instead of being a Nominative, was an Accusative governed by the Preposition; before this time eche would have preceded ayenste. We saw something like this in Lancashire in 1360. The there had always stood before is or was; the usage is now extended; for in p. 106 stands there com imbassetours.

In Rymer we see this endenture witnesseth, and no sounere, 19th June 1408.

In 'Ellis's Letters' (Second Series, vol. i.) we find unruely, p. 4; to bogil us (delay), p. 15; hence our intransitive boggle; his wey was clere, p. 22.

There is a poem of Occleve's, dating from 1402, to be found in 'Arber's English Garner,' iv. 54. We here see Gower's form concept. The old blaber is cut down to blab. There is the new noun crabbedness, formed from the Adjective. The word silly takes once more Trevisa's new meaning of stultus, p. 57; a silly simple woman; clerks, who hold a wrong opinion, are called silly in p. 64. Among the verbs are blow upon (slander). There is the Scandinavian word slut, applied to a woman. Among the Romance words are changeable, amiable, dissimile; dow is now changed into endow; we have seen indew. In p. 67 we find her impression (intent); we know the sense of empressé. Some in our Century have objected to the word talented; but in p. 66 we see entalented (willing) applied to courage.

A more famous poem of Occleve's, 'De Regimine Princupum' (Roxburgh Club), dates from 1412. He here tells us much about his trials in the office of the Privy Seal; he uses many phrases seldom repeated before Barclay's time, a hundred years later, such as, every man living, well worthy, nothing at all, small or none; there is also the Northern syn (quoniam) and fell in the Salopian sense of sapiens. The Latin way of spelling encroaches on the French; as doubtles, advoutry; the word perilous may be sounded as a dissyllable, whence the later parlous, p. 80; the u supplants o, as rumble for Chaucer's romble. Among the Substantives are shepes skyn (parchment), your myndes eye. Occleve contrasts the kynges draught (a paper drawn up by Henry IV.) with draughtes (moves at chess), p. 76; the poet knows the former, but not the latter. We here see the source of our game of draughts. We read of the king's impe (filius), p. 195; this word had hitherto expressed surculus, and the new sense was not thoroughly adopted before 1500. There is a new substantive pulle, p. 188; men wrestle a pulle. We see the new phrase my coigne worthe, p. 26 (my money's worth). In p. 195 stands that is the way to the conquering of blisse; "that is the way to do it." Barbour had already employed way for method. In p. 150 we find tyme and tyme (time after time), we now use this repetition only in the Plural; "he was years and years about it." Among the new Adjectives are longe lyved, depe rooted, welthy, unknyghtly. The old brotherly is revived after a very long sleep; the lyke is used to compound from a Romance noun; cerclelyke (circular) stands in p. 184. The comparative bet (better) stands for plus; twenty pound and bet, p. 16. We have seen Chaucer's deadly sleeping; we now hear of a dede slepe, p. 40. As in Chaucer, the my is coupled with a noun, something like the French madame; "call Fortune my lady changeable," p. 50. A favourite phrase of ours appears in p. 109, it was no thyng like (it).

Among the Verbs are, I putte caas, halve it with you, bear love to, pike a thanke (used of flatterers, p. 110), take a part (character, office), have his course, have a faire chaunce of, take him to his winges. There is the provoking I tolde hym so, p. 26, so often used by our kind friends after some mishap. The Active Participle is in great use, as no wight livyng, p. 2; his lovyng tendirnesse, p. 27; whence the well-known loving kindness. In p. 33 stands do he what he do kan; this we have shortened. A new Optative idiom appears, wolde I slayne were, p. 75; here I (ego) should be the first word. In p. 19 stands take up a gise (fashion); here the new sense of adopt comes into the Verb. In p. 53 stands thou shalle do wele; here the do represents dugan (valere), not don (facere); this change we saw in Yorkshire about this time. The verb slip is used in a new way, slippe aside, p. 79. A new verb, bag (put in bags), appears in p. 153. The verb rest becomes transitive, God reste thy soule! p. 76. A most curious idiom of time stands in p. 29, twenty yere come Estren; I suppose this is the Imperative veniat. In p. 118 stands it ferde sharp with you; hence the later go hard with you; fare has been largely supplanted by go.

Among the Adverbs are yerly (yearly); Chaucer's not at all comes very often. In p. 68 is also siker as I stonde here. There is the concise why not? p. 175. The well is brought forward, it was alle wele, p. 135; it is prefixed to worthy, as wel worthy to be, p. 115. Among the Prepositions are of his owen free will, at longe rennyng (in the long run), he was at hir. In p. 168 stands for shame! here the fe, which should have come first, is dropped.

The new Scandinavian words are skittishe and to skocche (lacerare).

Among the Romance words are mortify, plurality, motive, convertible, impotence, pamphlet, moralise, affeccion, aged, a pynchepeeny (niggard), portrature (picture), sensibilittee (wisdom), ficcoun, myscreavant. We hear of the office of the Privé Seel, where Occleve dwells, p. 29. In p. 23 duetee stands for a payment of money due; the adjective due stands for debitus. There is the new phrase every place of his body. In p. 56 men are allowed money for payment; here the sense of alouer (allocare) once more supplants that of alouer (allaudare). The verb use now expresses tractare; to use her, p. 57. The noun couple is applied to a man and wife; wedded couples, p. 57. The adjective tender expresses heedful; I am tendir of your estate, p. 73; hence came a later verb, much used in the next Century, to tender a thing (be careful of it). We read of stuffe of intelligence, p. 75, implying the equipment of a wise man; hence "the sound stuff in a book." In p. 106 stands polished speech; a new sense of the verb. In p. 112 the verb chaufe is first used of the mind, not of the body. In p. 134 Nature gave favour of shappe and beautee to him; this favour we saw before. In p. 140 lyne stands for family. In p. 169 discover expresses revelare; hence persons on the stage are discovered. In p. 196 stands beseech him of indulgence; here the noun is not used in its usual religious sense. In p. 26 is the curious phrase my blewes (blue clothes); the first instance of a Plural adjective without any substantive; hence the regiment known as The Blues. In p. 113 there is a tale about a king's fool; an early appearance in our literature of this official. In p. 118 I do a thing in my persone; personally was soon to appear as a new word for ipse. There is the phrase to deface his face, p. 134; sue a writte against him, p. 147, a new use of the verb; make a mocion to him, p. 179. We see rapine; our language henceforth could boast three variations of the old Aryan letter-change for one idea; we had, from the very first, used our own Low German reaf (reave or rove); we next, in 1160, got the High German rob, coming to us through the French; we lastly, in 1412, adopted the Latin rap, as seen in this rapine. With these varying forms we may compare tegment, thatch, deck.

Oocleve tells us in p. 92 that Edward the Third used to go about in disguise to hear what his people said of him; many a later ballad turned upon this circumstance. The poet shows a spirit of humanity unusual in that age; he mourns over the struggle between France and England; he rebukes France for her bloody civil wars, saying at the same time in p. 190, "I am an Englissheman and am thy foo."

We have seen far out in the field in 1360; Dr. Murray's Dictionary gives us the shortened a feld for abroad about this time.

In the Coldingham papers of the year 1414 is the phrase, al othir and sundry thynge, p. 86; and the legal verbs are coupled, gif and graunt. A law paper begins thus, be it knawen till all men, p. 86. We saw of age in 1280; the of is still applied to time, for we have here, of tyme begane and for to come; this use of byegone is something new. Among the French words is to distreyn tenants. To the year 1417 belongs a letter, written a treshon' & tres reverent Madame la Countesse de Westmerland; this begins with, Right honorable & worchepful my Lady; the first use, I think, of the two last words as an English vocative singular, p. 89.

An Alliterative poem of some length was written in 1415; it is addressed to Henry V., then setting out on his French campaign; it may be found, under the title of 'The Crowned King,' at the end of Skeat's Edition of 'Piers Ploughman' (Early English Text Society). The word manhode is used for virtus in p. 527; doughtynesse takes the same meaning in p. 528; there is the new phrase his well doying, p. 526. There is worldly wise, highlich honoured. The King is addressed with thou and also with ye. We see y hight you (I assure you), p. 524. The French words are marchall (dux), principaltee; requyre takes the sense of jubere, p. 525; hit clered is remarked of the weather in the same page.

The York Pageants of 1415 are valuable as giving us, for the first time, the names of a few trades, some Teutonic, others Romance.¹ We have the plummers, pulterers, joiners, carvers, sawyers. The old vynter, which had lasted in this form for 120 years in England, now becomes vintner; just as preateþ became pretneþ in 1300.

The English pieces in Rymer for this period begin with the confession of the high-born traitors, Cambridge and York, in August 1415; we see that, theyre, theym, employed for the Southern thilk, her, hem, though it was not till later in the Century that these Northern forms wholly got the mastery over their Southern rivals; King Henry V. comes before us, and we may now fairly begin to talk of King's English. He writes an English State paper with his own hand on 25th January 1417; he cleaves to ne (nec) and uses hem ought, thinking no doubt that the last word should English oportet. In a document of 2d February we read of the Duke of Beyer (Bavaria), where the German sound of the word is preferred to the French. A long State paper was drawn up by Henry V. on 26th October 1418, when he was besieging Rouen; here there are as many Romance nouns, verbs, and adverbs as there are Teutonic words of this kind; our State papers henceforth were always to be compiled in this style. There is a curious interchange between of and on in the mater is so great of itself. We hear of weyes and meanes, and personell socours of the King; this word personal and also its adverb is in our day made to do duty, as a fine word, for ipse and suus.¹ In 1420 Henry is addressed by his trusty Yorkshire deputy, Waterton, as most dredde Lord; a new variation of dreadful. On 22d May in that year, the conquering King announces his new style (titles) in Latin, French, and English; he uses the French form espiritual.

Rymer prints many English documents between the years 1420 and 1422. It is curious to find the Earl of Salisbury using the old word aghwere (ubique), which seldom appeared afterwards: this is in a letter of 1421. The form Boeme is used, not the Beeme of later days. Henry V. is addressed as Your lordschip. Salisbury says in a despatch that we misse no man of thrift (worth, value); "by my thrift" was an oath of these times. We talk of a lump sum; in these papers we find a some in grete. There are the new phrases, oon and the same persone, all and ych of us. The Passive Participle Absolute was making great strides; we have here thirty days accounted for a month, where we should say, counting thirty days, etc. Ambassadors are directed to fall ynne to ask something; this means, I suppose, that they are to do it incidentally. There is the Adverb lovingly. We see atte ferthest. The old idiom "hold him for king" gives birth to the strange phrase, used of the future Charles VII., berynng hymself for the Dolphin; like our giving himself out for. The French concerning is used as a Preposition for the first time, I think; thynges concernyngh th' exercice, p. 918; this was to supplant the older touching. Among the French words we see immediately, enemy, conversant, zeal, commissioners. Mention is made of brigaundes—that is, French foot-soldiers. The new Queen is called Madam Katherine, the first instance, I think, of this title being prefixed to a name; our péasants still use it as a title of honour, as, Madam Aubrey. The Beyer of other state papers is now written Bauveir, in the French way. In p. 162 we see both the new Christien and the old Cristen.

Waterton, a true Yorkshireman, uses the noun wage, not the Southern wages; at your wage. The word scutes (crowns, the coin) is formed from the Latin, not from the French. The Romance and Teutonic are coupled in neccessaire and behoveful. We see besaiel used for great-grandfather; English pedigrees must have been drawn up in French about this time. In p. 920 mention is made of places of (the king's) obedience—that is, “obeying the King;” we still talk of the Latin obedience.

In a Norwich Guild, rehearsing Henry the Fifth's grant in the East Anglian dialect in 1418 (qwich, arn, mikil, xal), we see felawes contracted into felas; “quichever they think best,” a continuation of Wickliffe's new phrase; as is to bisy them to hear; there is the foreign progenitors.

In a ballad of 1420, made against Oldcastle (‘Political Songs,’ ii. 244), doom seems to add the sense of pœna to that of judicium; what dome wold ye hym devise? sekte is applied, not only to the Monkish Orders as of old, but to the Lollard Dissenters.

Many new phrases of this time are to be found in Ellis's ‘Original Letters.’ Archbishop Chicheley uses the old form whow for our how. We see the form Beme for Bohemia; there is also Duchelond (Germany); the German sound, not the French, is used in Mayns and Trere, showing how they pronounced ai and ie. In August 1422 Henry the Fifth sends home a long list of his ships and their masters; among the latter appear William Robynson and John Bull ; one of the ships is called le Litell John. Henry addresses his Council as right trusty and welbeloved ; he piles his nouns together, writing the sauf retournyng hoom of the men. We have ever out of mende (mind), to express semper. We see the verbs, make zow sure of it, put in feere.

There are French terms, such as the trewes expired, lege (3 miles), annuity.

In the 'Plumpton Letters' of this time (Camden Society), xlvi.1., we see nonage ; sal is still used for shall in Yorkshire ; there is kepe watch and ward, these are transposed since Gower's time. A letter begins thus : To all men that, etc. . . . Henry Percy sends greeting ; ferme becomes farme. We see the title Richard Fairfax, Squier.

The Rolls of Parliament for this Century well repay perusal ; it is easy to see the shire whence the petitions come ; Norfolk and Salop are very easy to distinguish. The first English paper is dated in the year 1414, and may be found in vol. iv. p. 57. We find the new Substantives, land-holder and tounship ; there is the lately-coined phrase tyme of mynde (memory). Mention is made of men of her owne clothyng, referring to some Canons ; we should say "men of their cloth." The Latin per is Englished, by strengthe of it ; we substitute on for by. The Adverb is confused with the Adjective ; for ungodly, p. 58, evidently stands for male. Among the verbs are, I trust to God, let to farm, kepe the pese. Other foreign words are suytor, repele.

Turning to the year 1422 (p. 173), we find the two forms receit and recept, a mark of the new Latin influence (this we saw in Gower) at work in France and England ; we now write the strange p, but do not sound it. There is the new phrase, for the tyme beyng. We hear of a subsodie of Tonage and Poundage, Justice of pees ; wardes, mariages, etc., the clerck of the Counseill, enact.

In a petition from Ireland, 1423, we see the nor of 1290 replacing the old Southern ne (p. 198), though the later form's victory throughout all England was not achieved until 150 years afterwards. The old Bristow gives place to Bristoll, following the Latin form Bristolliu. A great Irish rebel, probably Maethomas, appears as Thomasson, p. 199; Thompson is now a common name with us. Among the Substantives, we see the Dutch hoggeshede (ox-head, properly), and the French Staple. Among the Adjectives appears blak rente, in connection with the Irish enemy; also Barbour's phrase, he is like (likely) to lose it. We have the origin of "I put it to you," when men put bills unto the council; further, the Council sit on bills, p. 201. As to the Adverbs, the Gloucestershire forasmuch comes into London use; where that stands for our whereas, p. 198; and thereas is used in the same way, p. 249. We hear of bringing silver in masse, p. 257; our penny-a-liners would alter this into en masse. The Kernes of Ireland appear in p. 199. A Teutonic ending is added to a French word, and we have napkin, p. 228; this stands in the middle of a long French inventory, containing lawn,¹ pece d'Aras, carpette, Worstede bloy (blue), stuff de Meaux, autre cloth, paille (pail), muskball, bracelet, tissu, a charger. In p. 198 we find hewe or cry; we come across the King's Sergeant, and the Maistre of the Mynte. There is the verb endoce (the French form, not the Latin indorse); the Commons are addressed, please it your discretions, p. 249, the first instance of an abstract noun being used as a title of honour in the Plural. The Active Participle is coming into vogue instead of the rightful Passive; we see provydyng that, savyng (except) the peine; also, except that, p. 256 (here it is præter, not nisi). There is our Bible phrase, resoun wolde he should, etc., where wolde stands for willed (jussit). In p. 257 we hear of billon of silver (bullion); in p. 256 alay (alloy) stands in connexion with plate. The legal word attachment appears.

In the year 1425 the old stamp of English is seen in forms like whuch and beon, p. 268. There is the shortened form Ascension Eve, p. 267; new titles of honour come in, such as, my lord of Derby, my lady of Gloster. We find forms like "the king that last died;" "opon late days." Shakespeare's ripe scholar is foreshadowed in p. 271, "matters ripely felt," that is, "thoroughly;" this word of Barbour's was much in use throughout this Century; fruit that is ripe has come to its full or thorough perfection. In p. 267 how so that expresses quamvis. Among the verbs are, clepe (call) unto minde; utter the matter (this is also a phrase of Lydgate's); give in articles; I take you for, etc.; keep hospitality. In p. 289 stands the opening of a petition, shewyn and beseech your leges. The Latin is imitated in hit is thought to the king. In the verb emboldish (embolden), p. 292, a Teutonic root takes both prefix and suffix from the Romance. The most curious phrase is in p. 298, the cause of his being here; it seems to me that this being is a Verbal Noun, though Mätzner makes it a Gerundial Infinitive; the question is a hard one; we must remember the ther is na mending the state of the 'Cursor Mundi.' As to Prepositions, the by, as Layamon employed it, is used for solemn adjuration; promytting by the faith of his body and his word of Prince, p. 297; we should now substitute as for the last of. The French words are personely, notable, simplesse (ignorance), letters tesmoignals (testimonials), Master of Chancery. There is a famous Peerage case, with English pleadings, p. 267; we see the Court ruled that, demy sank (half-blood), peedegree, create an Earl, your Noblesses, to taillie (entail) a name to him. Rather later, many clerical terms come, such as parsonage, vikerage, the rate, the dewes (dues), the encumbent. The habit of putting non before our words is now beginning. We have seen nonage; non-residence stands in p. 90. The old brucan (in the sense of frui) had almost gone out; to rejoice a title, and also to enjoie my place, stand close together in p. 274; the former was rather later to lose the sense of frui. There are the verbs resort, be of counsel with, abstene them from, embesil. Return comes for the first time, I think; to return names, p. 306; in France this word had been transitive before it became intransitive.

In Gregory's Chronicle for these years we observe the dropping of the n in an, against all reason; a awngylle appears in p. 113; a French word for ordnance is written artyrly, p. 126; the town of Meaux was still pronounced Mewys, p. 142, a finer sound than the later Mo; the French Cherbourg was sounded in English mouths as Chyr- borowe, p. 121. We see promise to dwellyng (dwellen) in p. 154; this shows how easily the Infinitive and the Verbal Noun might get confounded. The old loppetstre now becomes lopstere (our lobster). There are the new substantives, stronghold, strenghtys (fortresses), a word kept in our Bible. The new mode of warfare was making progress, for powder and schotte are coupled together in p. 118; and the French gens de trait is Englished by folke of schotte, p. 155.

As to Adjectives, Chaucer's overest yields to the new uppermoste, p. 113. The old self makes way for the king's owne propyr person in the same page. Among the Verbs there is a new construction, where the Past and Future are combined; in londys gotyn or to be gotyn, p. 134. There is the new Adverb, lyke wyse, p. 133, where a preceding in has been dropped. Among the Prepositions stands swear apon honoure, p. 119; we find also continue, altercacyon, confyderatys, mommynge, datys (the fruit), crevys, which we now call cray fish; mineuse (minnows).

The King addresses his soldiers at Agincourt as Serys (Sirs) and felowys; something like the Greek andres; we hear of 4 payre of galowys, p. 108. A foreign word is used and explained; sedylle, id est, a bylle, p. 121; our schedule. We find Scott's phrase, "to image something," p. 133. The former French purveit is thrown aside for the Latin form; provided alleway that, etc., p. 152. The prefix re was to gain ground in England all through this Century; refortify stands in p. 261. We see porpys (porpoise, the porcupiscis); we have taken this French form instead of our old mereswine; while oddly enough the French have exchanged their old porcepeis for the Teutonic marsouin.¹ There is the puzzling word prane (prawn).

The siege of Rouen in 1418 was described in a long poem by John Page, an eye-witness, writing after the surrender, p. 1: 'Collections of a London Citizen' (Camden Society). Page was a Northern man, as we can tell by his use of gain (prope), boun (paratus), marcyfull, manful, fray, and thrill (not thirl). We see the sound i or y replacing the old ea, as lykys (leeks), the former leac. The old calk- trap loses its k. The fight between Teutonic and Romance forms was still lasting; one manuscript of the poem has neweltie, where another has novyltye; the form reward is often used for regard. The starved French garrison, so it is written, were but bonys and bare skyn, p. 43. A curious idiom connected with our Definite Article is first seen in p. 8; while he lived, he was the man; that is, the very model of a man; we know our common "he's the fellow!" There are also a hundryd or two, and two halfe hourys. Among the Verbs are take grounde, put him unto grete coste, end up a sege (like dish up), come of (evadere, our get off). There is the curious verb to pyttefall; also to owtefalle (sally); an outfall was a word in use in the British army down to 1715, as we see by Colonel Blackader's diary. In p. 15 our men, when fighting the enemy, gaffe hem mete; we should now say, "gave them their bellyful." Among the French words are ordynaunce (cannon, it would seem, a more restricted sense than in the Mandeville treatise), turnepykys, p. 17 (some warlike engine). The French Char-treuse appears as a house of Chartere, p. 6. The verb pyll had hitherto been used for plunder; it now means the peeling of vegetables, p. 18. Men are smitten pytyfully in p. 3; there is the verb yssue out. We first hear of children's pappe in p. 35; this is common to many Teutonic tongues.

In Halliwell's 'Original Letters of the Kings of England' there are some written by Henry V. in 1419. He employs conclude (followed by an Infinitive) for statuere, just as the Americans use it now; see p. 90. He uses Barbour's manrent when speaking of the Scotch forcés. In p. 100 stands the to-us-ward of our Bible; a marriage is betrotted; there is the phrase, of your own good motion; with us move has long expressed proponere.

In the 'Political Songs' (Master of the Rolls), p. 123, there is one on Azyngcorte felde, as the phrase began to run. We see Depe, the old way of pronouncing Dieppe; we have the first notice of the King's hy way, to be repeated in Lydgate; there is also lordes of name. We read of two thousand cotarmers (knights wearing coat armour).

In the Wills of this time (Early English Text Society)

stand the new Compound Substantives, werynge clothes, mylche kye; also cloth of werk opposed to plain cloth, p. 56. The son was coming into use in forming proper names; we light upon Rogerysson of London, p. 41. We see the form Jane, p. 50, in the year 1422; Joan had come earlier; Cecile stands for a woman's name in p. 56. A famous Herefordshire family appears as Skydmore, p. 50; and in the next Century it might be written Scudamore. We have seen Powles, where church is omitted; this is carried a step further in p. 38, where Fishers and Bowdenss are used, without house being added. The Old English studu (postis) now gives birth to stud (ornament in dress), p. 46. A peyre rakkes of yryne appear as kitchen furniture in p. 56.

A testator talks of clove fote beasts in p. 23; in the same way barefoot is much older than barefooted. We have seen that Henry V. was a main agent in bringing their and them into Southern use instead of the old her and hem; John Broune, of Henry's chamber, follows the fashion set by his master, in p. 43. In p. 53 a Yorkshire knight talks of my lady my moder, a phrase that we have shortened. The verb go takes the new sense of reach; a certain quantity of bread is to be distributed, als fer als it will go, p. 40. The legal habendum clause is done into English, "enfeof them in rent, to have to hem for evermore," p. 25.

There is the Scandinavian becure (poculum), p. 45. Among the new Romance words are dobelet, hoby (horse). We hear, in p. 35, of godes and catallys (chattels); the first instance, I think, of this combination in the Plural; it comes in a Salopian will. In a Bristol will, p. 45, we see first halfe a dosyn off sponys, and then halfe a dosen sponys. In p. 53 we find billes used in connexion with tradesmen. In p. 65 stands a pece of silver; we should now say piece of plate. To express fresh bequests, the item is brought into English where also had been formerly written, p. 31.

The Rutland neighbourhood has had so much to do with forming Standard English, that I call particular attention to a Rutland will of 1424 (p. 55). The testator uses the right form Roteland ; but the editor of 1882 chooses to talk of Rutlandshire. We see the Northern forms, kyrke, mykyl, ilk (quisque), kye, showing how much the great poem of 1303 must have been altered by the Southern transcriber. There is the Northern do well to him, p. 57, afterwards repeated by Coverdale. The substantive course is now made an Adjective ; two cors bordcloths, p. 56 ; things of common course paved the way for our coarse. In the same page, a huge cup is bequeathed from heir to heyr lome, whence came heirloom ; the old geloma had always meant furniture. In p. 57 we see both grauntfader and grauntmoder, I think for the first time ; but the old ealdfader lasted sixty years longer.

Many of Wickliffe's works (Early English Text Society) seem to me to be translations executed by his followers, and to date from about forty years after his death. These works may be found at pp. 327, 359, 408. There is an allusion in p. 457 to the Pope, then living at Avignon, showing the date of the Latin original. As tokens of late origin we may remark the following :—Lydgate's wacche-man, Pecoock's movable and layman, pis late Pope, have as leve to be, (would as soon be, etc.), p. 333 ; alle a mysse, p. 388, a favourite Lollard pun on almesse (alms), eny langer ; there is also a new form like non-residence, and allow in the sense of permittere. All these phrases seem to me to belong to the Fifteenth Century. We talk of "light and leading ;" in p. 414 prelates give lore and leding to their people. Among the Verbs are zyve occasioun, no good comes of it, set to sale (a new noun), take degre in scole. The Passive voice makes a further stride in the phrase, (it) ouzte to be taken hede to. There is an extension of the old idiom with do, saving repetition ; þe clergi haþ robbid, and zit doþ, þe chirche, p. 392. The verb love is used much as we use like ; he lovyde hem to be riche, p. 440. The verb wed is used for jungere ; weddid wiþ mannus lawe, our "wedded to an opinion ;" here Udal's to has supplanted the old wiþ, p. 448. The word root is dropped after take ; God's word takiþ not wiþ hem, p. 443 ; our medical men talk of vaccination taking. The Infinitive now follows nigh ; (they) ben ful nyȝ to synne azeyne, p. 339; in the phrase "he was near doing it," the doing may perhaps be an Infinitive.

There is a change in Adverbs; the litlum and litlum of Piers Ploughman becomes bi litil and litil, p. 456; in the same page licly is made an Adverb for the first time; this is still used as a Positive in Scotland, though we of the South can say only "most likely" (probably).

There is the word rack (præsepe) akin to the Dutch; have at racke and at manger, p. 435.

Among the Romance words are arbitrary, to transsubstance, empugn, litergi (lethargy), yvel avised, þe mynor (in logic), myschevous, predecessor, progenitor, glebe (of parsons), to induct, plete (implead), to distill waters, fallas (deceit), ages (sæcula), beddis testeris. There is the phrase no doute (sine dubio). The verb allow (allocare) bears the new sense of permittere; Christ alowid þe comonte her lifflode, p. 387. The new word aprove (laudare) stands in the next page. There is another new phrase in p. 390; dispence wiþ hem of þat bond; we have altered this into "dispense with that bond, as regards them." In p. 454 presently stands for present (adstans). A curate may have a clerk or a spenser to distribute alms, p. 413. The evil of Church appropriations is denounced in p. 419; cathedral chirchis, chapels of prinsis, and collegies of studies, all use this craft of appropriing; vikeris are brought in, p. 424, in the parson's stead. In p. 433 stand þe housis of þe personage (Church endowment); hence comes parsonage. We hear that God is lord general, p. 431; the adjective is one of the few that we still place after the substantive. Popes crie something as (true) belief, p. 334; hence the future cry up something. The Lollards are called Christ's secte, p. 334, in opposition to Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, and Friars.

Foxe has set out an old Lollard treatise (Cattley's edition, ii. 728), which seems to me to date from about 1420. It was compiled (see p. 738) at some time when heretics were allowed to abjure once, but were burnt for any fresh offence. There are the new phrases, far gone from and parsonage, found in the Rolls about this time. It is written in the Southern dialect, very unlike that of London; and it may belong to the Severn country. We see ybeldded (built), p. 745; there is an allusion to the Welsh and their long legs, p. 744; the verb fullen (baptizare) occurs in p. 734, which survived in Gloucestershire for a hundred years longer till Tyndale's time; he printed this treatise, before Foxe did. I think it is the most sound and vigorous English prose that was composed in the fifty years before Pecoock. The ness was much used; we have naughtines, cruelnes. There is the phrase nothing to the purpose. The word matter means, as before, constraining cause, p. 732; here is much matter of sorowe. A priest is called a secular man, p. 733, as opposed to a monk. In 1220 it was allowed that religious men might mix with the world for purposes of charity ('Ancren Riwle,' p. 10); but in 1420 the title, men of religion, is appropriated to those who shut themselves up from the world; see p. 733. We see here repeated Chaucer's change in the word quaint, p. 733; it had meant in the previous century elegant, exquisite, and this lasted till Shakespere; the Church prayers, sung in Latin, were called quaint by the priest; but as they were not understood by the common folk, they seemed to be strange. In p. 733 we hear of quaint prayers, following the first sense; in 735 we hear that these ben quaint orders of religion, that live an immoral life, owing to the law of celibacy; here we have the second sense.

There is a treatise on Hunting in 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' i. 149, which seems to belong to this time; it is the translation of a French work a century older. The word stag here translates cervus, p. 151, as in the 'Towneley Mysteries.' In the same page we read of the male fox and the female; happily the old vicen is still alive. The season of the fox, we are told in p. 154, begins at our Lady's Nativity and lasts till the Annunciation. In p. 153 we read of the lawe of venery; this phrase led, I suppose, to giving an animal law. In the next page we learn that the technical word for a herd of roes is a bevy, the first appearance of the French word. French Interjections swarm in this treatise; they are to be used by the huntsman in cheering on his dogs, as douce amy, soho ! oiez à Bemond, our "hark to Beaumont !"

In p. 205 there is a poem to London, perhaps by Lydgate; the great city is called an A per se, a phrase answering to our A one; it is called in p. 206 towne of townis patron; in the last word the sense of dominus slides by degrees into that of exemplar, as remarked before. We hear in the same page of merchants of substawnce (property) and the top royall of a ship; these are new phrases.

The Legend of St. Edith, or the Chronicle of Wilton (Horstmann's edition), was compiled in verse about 1420. This Wiltshire production is the last of the markedly Southern poems; we here see hoe and he for illa, þulke for iste; the Northern þey, as in Trevisa, supplants the old hi; there are the forms blesud (blessed), myztus (might). There is the very old form kindam (regnum), from cyne; also yche a (quisque); blessed locur (more blessedly), p. 61. The Teutonic wis supplants the proper Romance ending ous, as pytewis, vertwys, etc. The great Southward march of Northern words was still going on; we here see whethen (unde), arne (sunt), gate (via), boske (parare); the old urne (currere) has made way for run. The language is much akin to that of Trevisa in the adjoining shire; particularly, he nadde no gret wyllle to, etc., p. 87. The zeke (eke), p. 76, and the won (unus) remind us of Salop.

The a replaces e, as frantyeke, p. 53. The t is struck out, as Hampshyre, p. 13; the final þ is clipped, for Ede stands for Ediþ all through. The final r is clipped, quarrer becomes quarey, p. 82.

We see stall (seat in the choir), p. 69. A prelate is ordered to hold his clappe (clack), p. 75. The new idiom of the Double Genitive is coming in fast; þe erle of Wyltones wyf, p. 4. There is the phrase, blind as a betulle, p. 81; also þe later hende (end), p. 50; a new phrase, appearing in the South, just when Wyntoun was employing it in the North. We see, what gode is hit forte be a kynge? p. 77. The Reflexive Dative appears once more after rest; rest 3ou wyllle (well), a greeting found in p. 11.

Among the Verbs are blow ouzt þe leyzt, wyrche up (finish) his werk, p. 79. There is Barbour's new phrase, lede (vehere) stones, p. 82, which still lingers in some shires. We saw the Gloucester adjective mopish in 1300; men in distress mepe up and down, p. 81.

Among the Romance words are flavour, particle, sensualyte, pasture a beast, a mute, conversant, migraine. The lesson is read in church, p. 23; we hear that limbs have organs, p. 56; the word page is employed for a groom or horse-tender, p. 74. In p. 111 diseyse keeps its old sense of incommodum; in p. 107 it takes the new sense of morbus. In p. 31 laudable is used where we should put laudatory. The save is much used for praeter, as in a hundred save one. In p. 86 the foreign plead becomes a Strong verb; he pladde (pleaded); this most unusual change, or something like it, is still kept in Scotch law.

In p. 111 it is complained that no man will now believe in miracles; the Lollards had long been at work.

To the same dialect belongs the Legend of St. Etheldreda, printed by Horstmann, 'Altenglische Legenden,' p. 282. The u is still employed for eo; there is Layamon's dure (carus), p. 299, which is not usual. A light went out, p. 305. The French word mater expresses pus, p. 293; and the word lawnset (lancet) appears; a candle is set in a sconse, p. 290. A well-known part of Ely Cathedral is called þe lanterne of Englonde, p. 303. A curious corruption of a female Genitive is seen in the same page, Awdrey's body (Awdrey's body).

A Poem on Cookery was written, most likely in Lancashire, about the year 1420. We see both the forms ezren and egges, heo (illa), and the West Midland Plural schyn (shall), also anykins. The e replaces iw, as bre for briv, p. 46; this is the barley bree of the North. The u is struck out; weluc (concha) becomes welk. The y replaces u; there is the Northern pyt (ponere) in p. 23; this is common in Scotland. The l is struck out, as wynnnot, the Scotch winna, for will not, p. 45.

Among the Substantives are hagese (haggis), otemele, stok fysshe. The dripping so well known to our cooks is seen here as droppynge, p. 31; the grounds found in a vessel appear as the groundynge, p. 46.

Among the Verbs we see hew smalle, rost browne, gyf hit a boyllynge; the verb cremele (crumble) is formed from crumb.

Akin to the Dutch are pikel, sod (gramen). The Scandinavian words are stepe (infundere), offal.

The new French words, as might be expected, are many; such as tost (toast), souse, grave (gravy), mince, clou (clove), comfet, corauns (currants), lard, dressore (dresser), onyon, filet, tarilot, porray (whence porridge), bray (terere), stuffe (stuffing). In p. 5 stands the phrase "to serve flesh." There is grap-pays (grampus), from the Spanish gran pez (big fish).

About this year, 1420, we may consider the poems of King James I. of Scotland, who followed in the wake of Chaucer and Gower, "superlative poets," as he calls them.¹ To the Chaucerian influence are due the Southern forms, y-lokin, thilke, moche, here to be found. We see Barbour's convey and convoy, bout for bolt; in trundle a u replaces an e; there is Meg for Mag. The l replaces n in freckle for Chaucer's frekne. The p replaces c in porpapyne (porcupine). There is the substantive cadger; we find the phrase, a world of folk; also, hald thy grippis, p. 69, where the last word follows in the wake of clutches. We hear of a chamber, large rowm and faire; here the room (locus) begins to gain a new meaning, which took long to reach the South. We see the faire, p. 76, where woman is dropped; the true Northern phrase werey (bellicus) appears. In p. 54 we read, "the strait weye will I send him to," etc.; this phrase seems here to add the sense of time to that of direction.

Among the verbs we have breke louse, mene well, give a fall, sun-brynt. The verb fling gains a transitive sense and expresses torquere. There is, take up a song; that is, raise it. A man is fortired of thought; it was Scotland that preserved the old verb tire. The verb inbring, which occurs here, was in great vogue at Edinburgh.

The Scandinavian words are elk, and to stand askewis (askew), p. 66.

Among the Romance words are casualtee (chance), resident, god fortune, the ravin bear, intelligence (scientia). There is the Past Participle unquestionate, where a Latin ending is used; hence the later form affectionate; further on stands well fortunyt, where we now employ the ending in ate. The phrase my joy, sounded like the French jou, is applied to a woman, p. 80; hence the Scotch my joe; my joy is a Yorkshire term of endearment in our days.

Andrew of Wyntoun, Prior of Lochleven, wrote his riming Chronicle soon after 1420 (Laing's edition, 1872); we here find many phrases not used since Barbour's time. We see Layre, showing the old sound of the name of the river Loire. The i is inserted in scisim, much as we pronounce it. The b supplants f; for the French frush, used a few years earlier in England (ruere), becomes brush, ii. 493; whence our brush (pugna). The b is inserted in nymbil. The z is dropped; Layamon's forn azan now appears as afornens, ii. 230, whence comes fornenst. The old agast (territus) is altered into aghost; here the idea of ghost must have come in. The ou or oy replaces o; doted becomes doytyd (stultus), ii. 4. The w is often used for v, leading to much confusion of sounds; there is chewalry, and also Murraw (Moravia), our Murray; so schirraw (often found here), written for schirraf (sheriff), led the way to shirra.

Among the Substantives are man of war (miles), spayman (wizard), Hieland men, an unfrend; the Old English glomung (twilight) reappears. There is Neder Germany, leading the way to the later Netherlands, Litill Brettayne (Brittany); also Gret Brettane, ii. 11: a term loved by Scotch writers, such as Barclay and Knox. Manning's verb upset takes a new meaning; for an upsete stands for rebellion or revolution, something like the French bouleversement, ii. 297, 373. The word trade (trodden path) is in constant use, meaning voyage; hence the trade winds; this word was not common in England until ninety years later. There is the phrase latere end (mors), ii. 100. The old form dyke has always expressed murus in the North, ii. 454 ; a sense very different from that of the ditch of the South. In ii. 134 fare begins to be connected with money ; four pennys for her fare. The old inneuwearde (viscera) is revived, after a long sleep ; the inward (of the kingdom), ii. 464 ; hence came Tyndale's inward parts.

Among the new Adjectives are werelike (bellicosus), the werely of James I., writing about the same time ; also clerklyk. Pope Joan is called a schrewe fyne, ii. 81 : this adjective was now coming into vogue. There is a favourite Scotch use of full in relationships ; full brother to him, iii. 99 ; we hear of hard fighting. The phrase mystly is often used for mystically ; hence we apply misty, mystify, to the mind. There is a curious new phrase in ii. 471 : thai trayst hyr all thair best ; this is an advance on the former do their best. In ii. 489 stands ane man worthe Franche twa ; here the Numeral follows the worthe.

There is a new phrase in ii. 332, send it in thare helpyng ; hence "come to my help," a curious use of the Possessive Pronoun.

Among the new Verbs are, blok a matere ; in iii. 37 comes bolt up (rush up), a new sense of the verb. There are the phrases, make answer, spare besynes (pains), fall vacant, take sted (place), well horsyd, he was sete hard (hard set), ii. 449, give him rowme, put to confusion, brek lous (loose ; also in James I.), get upon a courser. There is make owte his cours (accomplish it), i. 61 ; hence "to make out a journey ;" in the same page comes to sayle the Se. In i. 361 officials take up children (seize on them) ; a new phrase, well known to our police. In ii. 30 a maiden is kyrked ; the Southern English form came later. In ii. 353 stands set his besynes to have it ; hence, "make it his business to," etc., where the noun still keeps its oldest sense of sollicitudo. In ii. 472 we see he was set on it (resolved). The verb tyryd (fatigatus) stands in ii. 356 ; this favourite Scotch verb came South a hundred years later. There is the jingle to wed and bed ; also the Alliterative to gnyp and gnaw, i. 295 ; in England the first letter of gnyp had been docked. There is a curious confusion of the Strong and Weak verb in metal moltynnyd, i. 244 ; melted was to appear in Coverdale. The rightful weryd (wore) appears in ii. 417 ; but in ii. 328 something is worne out, a startling novelty that had appeared in Yorkshire.

We see both scantly and scant for vix ; there is onward, which took long to reach London.

The Scandinavian words are harsk (harsh), and brode (aculeus), whence comes our prod. There is the Celtic lowch (lacus), spate (flood), quhype (quip).

Among the Romance words are plesans (voluptas), mystik, enter (sepelire), toil (dolus), i. 400 ; dissent from, usurp, a garnysoun, inform, deputys, bachylere (in theology), insyngnys (insignia), fortalys. The word antyqwyteys is used for "old stories," i. 3. There is chawmbyr play (libido, i. 74), whence comes the later phrase, chambering, which is in our Bible. The verb examyne means to question ; and examynatioune, i. 340, is first connected with school work ; the form exam was still in the future. The word state, as later in Barclay, stands for a man of position ; we use dignity much in the same way. We read about a lady of fassoun fyne, i. 322 ; this refers to her form of body, her figure. In i. 323 comes hyr folys fantasy (her fool's fancy) ; this is a new use of the Genitive, afterwards repeated by Barclay, just as we say "your fool's head." In i. 351 comes dyspend owte tresore ; hence our lay out. The old French form cruelty is laid aside for the later French cruauté, which comes often ; another token of the close connexion between France and Scotland. Wyntoun often uses pathement for pavement, a compound of Teutonic and Romance ; he has dergat (target), where an Old English word takes a French suffix. The form pyté is still used, as in 1300, for our piety, ii. 70 ; it also expresses misericordia. There is the form corrump, afterwards to be replaced by corrupt, coming from another part of the Latin verb. There is revengeans, whence two distinct English words have been formed. The verb trete bears two senses ; that of tractare, ii. 144, as in Barbour, and that of pactum inire, ii. 420. The adjective round gets a new meaning, that of bluff ; *make round answe*r, iii. 66. We have seen the gentles ; we now find the nobles. There are two new and curious Plurals, devotions and instructions (preces, jussa). In ii. 325 a querele in law is propounded; we still propound a will; the other form, propose, had been known for eighty years. The word composytore, here standing for peacemaker, bears a very different sense in our day. In ii. 322 a heart is embalmed and laid in a cophyn of ivory; the word was to bear a new meaning later. In i. 20 supprys is used for surprising a woman asleep; in p. 117 for crushing in war; our suppress. We see a curious jumble of French and Latin forms in dissymbelatyown, ii. 332. In ii. 341 a man is mankynd (mutilatus); hence came mangle, forty years later. Wyntoun is fond of theolog, Dryden's theologue. We hear of the syngne of an inn, iii. 104. The word Amyrale is now connected with the fleet, and loses its Mussulman sense. There is the battle cry, A Muntagw for evyr mare! this a may perhaps be an Interjection, as A! Kynge Herry! in 'Warkworth's Chronicle,' fifty years later; this soldier's cry lasted till 1730 in England.¹ We now see the first of the laughable explanations of family names, legends that are lively as ever in our own critical age. The great house of Cumin, Wyntoun says, got its name from its ancestor being a doorkeeper in the Palace, who was always crying cum in! ii. 309. This is not more absurd than Sir B. Burke's derivation of the Bulstrode family from a man bestriding a bull. A few pages beyond his Cumin explanation, Wyntoun draws a distinction between the chief who bids his men go on, and the chief who bids them come on.

The poem on Kynge Roberd of Cysille ('Hazlitt's Collection,' i. 270) seems to belong to Lincolnshire. There is Manning's puddle; also gar, kyrke. There is the phrase make noyse; also, he was a fole to every knave, p. 286; here the to means, according to the knave's judgment; one of the oldest meanings of to was secundum.

I now approach that mine of information on many points, the 'Paston Letters' (Gairdner's edition). There are a few reaching over the interval between 1417 and 1426. On turning to the Vowels, there is more in this respect to remark in the French words than in the English; the verb aurai (habebo) is written aray; on the other hand, avec appears as auvec, showing the ancient broad sound of the a. But aussi, pronounced of old as oussi, is now written osy, proving a change in French pronunciation. We see u (aut), not ou. All this may be found in i. 23. As to Consonants, we find nought standing for our not, written so late as 1425 (p. 20). The proper name Wylleby (Willoughby) appears in p. 10, sounded much as we pronounce it now. Among the Nouns there is the curious idiom, in the kynges tyme Henry the Fyfte, p. 16. Barbour had written stop the way; we now have stop the noyse, p. 26: a slight change. There is the first instance, I think, of the legal use of where as for quoniam, in p. 16; hitherto where had been used in this sense. Among the Prepositions appear "send money on trust," p. 20; "condempnyd in ecc marcz," p. 21; to his knowleche, p. 17; the preposition to is wholly dropped in the trespas doon William, p. 17. As to Romance words, instead of the old phrase used with surnames, my maistre Neville, the Pronoun is now dropped, as Maister John Urry, p. 19, the origin of our mister. We see this usage moreover in the French, p. 24; an English letter is directed a mez meistres A, B . . . , et mestre Piers Shelton. A French letter ends with Johannes Paston, le tout vostre, p. 24; the French taught us the art of polite letter-writing. We read of arbitratores, also arbitrores, in the same page, 14; courtezane (curialis, p. 24). In p. 21 mesure gains the new sense of consilium; hence comes "measures, not men." In p. 26 stands the adverb noysngly; in York, noisomely would have been used; we have in our day two English sounds coming from one French source, noisome and nuisance, something like ennui and annoy. In p. 19 the word contreman seems to be used for fellow-provincial; for in p. 30 Manning's phrase is repeated, in my cuntre, but a myle fro the place where I was born. There are the phrases, tax damages, adnull, endowed (præditus, p. 21), due and lawefull, p. 13. The Latin words et cetera are tacked on to English writing, p. 13; they were to draw great attention later, in connexion with an oath in 1640.

In 1426 an old blind monk, known as 'Syr Jon Audlay,' was compiling his poems, striking at Lollards and worthless priests alike (Percy Society, 47). He lived on the border land between the Northern and Southern dialects, as we can tell from a few lines in page 65—

“And VII aves to our lady,
Fore sche is the wel of al peté,
That heo wyl fore me pray.”

There is no doubt about the monk's Salopian dialect; he has both cherche and kerke in the one page, 74; also forms such as fouyre (ignis), seche (talis), zesy, zevery, uche, won (unus), als, makus (socii), thou gase (vadis), ch for sh. There are words and senses of words already found in Salopian writers, such as, homeli (rusticus), begge ne borou; there is an allusion to Piers Ploughman's Mede the maydyn in p. 38. The scribe, to whom the blind bard dictated, has been faulty as usual; holdist is written for holdes, p. 20; woful begoon and Abragus for wo-bigon and Abraham's, p. 31.

The o replaces a in wedloke. We see both engeyme and enjoyn, pp. 47 and 48. The n is struck out, for Oxenford becomes Oxford, p. 32; it is added, for we find holdoun (olden) dais in p. 22. In p. 75 an original morn (mane) has been altered by the writer into morwe, as we see by the rime.

In p. 85 (this is from another poem) we see the rise of the word skipping applied to the practice of many readers. Careless priests are thus branded—

Jangler cum jasper, lepar, galper quoque, draggar.
Momeler, forskyyper, for-reyner, sic et overleper.”

The draggar is the forerunner of our drawlers.

Among the Adjectives we find oure blessud byscop, used ironically, p. 39. The word lofty appears for the first time, and is applied to the lineage of the child Henry VI., p. viii. The bad meaning given to lewd is repeated; the word still means ignurus, as of old, in p. 32; but in p. 3, curates who break their vows of chastity, and priests that are lewyl (libidinosi) in their living, are assailed for the bad example they set; this change had appeared in another Salopian piece.

Among the Pronouns we find me, the old man, still in use, though soon to drop; do as thou woldus me dud be the, p. 32. There is the phrase, what was (he) the worse? p. 15; fro tyme ze ben, etc., p. 76; here a that is dropped after the noun.

Among the Verbs we find bakbyte a man, play the fole, take order (orders, p. 34), have the charche (charge) of. The verb bluster is employed much like our blunder, p. 50.

We see wherefore and why, in p. 49, with the usual alliteration.

The French words are pauxe, aschelere (ashlar stone), hogpoch (hotchpot), core favel, p. 26; favel was a common name for a horse; hence the corruption curry favour. In p. 23 stands a metaphor taken from chess; after chec for the roke, ware for the mate. In p. 45 clerté and clerenes stand side by side.

There is a most spirited description, in p. 16, of our gentle Sir John, the usual name for a priest down to the Reformation; hence came the Mass John of the Scotch Presbyterians.

To this date we may assign the poem on Agincourt ('Hazlitt's Collection,' ii. 93). Among the substantives are gunstones (cannon balls of iron), longe bote, great gunne (cannon); our soldiers fight under the rede crosse, Saynt Georges stremers. Henry the Fifth was almost fit to be set among pe worthyes nyne, p. 94: a new phrase. He asks, in p. 105, what tyme of the day? (what hour is it?) We see both the forms, thou were and thou wast, p. 94. The king lay in a town: a phrase not wholly replaced by staid until our own Century; ships lay at rode; trumpets blow, an intransitive sense; men play their rivals at a game, p. 104, against being dropped. We see our a crosse for the first time, p. 96; it is here an adverb. There are some sea words borrowed from Holland, hoise (hoist), deck (teg-ere), the first letter differing from the true English theck, our thatch, the Latin teg. There is also the Scandinavian bulwark, one of Lydgate's new words. There is the French word serpentine (a warlike engine). We have a pun in p. 201—

English Poetry had now fairly made her way into the Palaces of Kings, whence she had been banished since Harold's time for 300 years. Chaucer had been the servant of Edward III.; Gower had been encouraged by Richard II.; Occleve had been the pensioner of Henry IV.; Page had sung the deeds of Henry V.; Lydgate acted as Laureate to the child Henry VI. The monk wrote a poem, setting forth the Royal titles, in the year 1426 ('Political Songs,' vol. ii.) He turns Madame Katerine into my lady Katerine, p. 136, and has the new noun budde, p. 140, akin to the Dutch. We may here consider the mass of the poems attributed to him.¹ He came from Bury in East Anglia, and we are therefore not surprised to find him using the Active Participle in and, and such East Midland forms as clad, give, fulsom. On the other hand, he imitates Chaucer in having the prefix to the Passive Participle, as y-bake. The adjective praty, gainsay, and the peculiarly Northern idiom, a goodly one, p. 28, have now reached London. He clips the a at the beginning of words, writing venter for aventure, and look bak (as in the 'Cursor') for look aback, p. 256. The e replaces i in flettyng (fleeing), p. 194. The old pure is now written pewer, p. 108, just as we sound it. Gower's falsehed now becomes falsehood. Orrmin's wakeman appears as wacheman, p. 175. We see the be clipped in p. 147, where cause translates quia. Wickliffe's Danish word backe (vespertilio) is now written batte, p. 170. The l replaces r; Chaucer's verb jompre becomes jumbel. The l is inserted; for the peoddare of 1220 now becomes pedeler, p. 30. The m becomes n, as ant (formica). Chaucer's cokewold is now seen as cokolde, p. 30.

bumble bee is seen as boymbyl, p. 218. We hear of the hedsprynge (well head) in p. 237.

The Old English earg had always borne the sense of ignavus down to this time; but in p. 47 we hear of arche wives, and from the context this epithet must imply pride. We hear of a fowlle shame, stormi, and gerysshe (garish, perhaps from Chaucer's gawren, gaze). In p. 194 sondryfold is formed in imitation of manifold; sundry can now express quidam as well as separatus. In p. 147 we see unkouth add the meaning of odd to its old sense of unknown.

Among the Verbs are, bend my stepps, thrust (ire), give chase, break out, abide by the bargin, hound on, I am a fool to telle, fre to syng, bolster, tourne (out) for the best, bere good face (put a good face on it). Lydgate now has the Northern I gat me out, p. 105. We have upgrow in p. 246; very few verbs beginning with up lasted beyond the year 1400, though the Scotch still use upbringing (education). The verb bestow here means præbere as well as collocare; bestow alms. There is a new construction of the Passive Infinitive after scire; I have wyste men be caste, p. 224. In p. 133 a man brekes his fast; hence a new noun was to arise forty years later. The new construction, thou ware over sayne (made a mistake) stands in p. 189. The great change of 1411 is repeated in p. 142; masse was seyeng; we see in the Rolls of Parliament for 1435 a dette was ovyng hem.

The most remarkable of the Adverbs, which we owe to Lydgate, is perhappous, which we now usually hear pronounced as praps; it took Centuries before this mongrel, something like because, could drive out haply. In p. 104 stands as well as I coode. The Preposition under is employed in a new sense, marking something that falls short of a given measure: thou scapst not under ii pence, p. 107. There is out of joynt in p. 245.

The Flemish traders in London are mentioned in p. 105, who use their word copen (emere). It was from them perhaps that Lydgate got his boueer, our boor, p. 192; for the Old English ge-bur seems to have died out hundreds of years before this time. The form before us suggests that the first syllable of the German bauer was pronounced like the French ou in 1430. The Dutch bolwerk (bulwark) is in p. 237 ; and their verb prate is in p. 155 ; to nod is akin to a Bavarian word.

Among the French words are dyal, tapcery (tapestry), weel favoured, chierful, fagot, cok-boat, pint, velym (vellum), cariage (bearing), to ferret, pores, splene, streight-lasyd, sorel, blase (blazon), grocery, premyence. The adverb very (valde) comes often ; after Lydgate's time it drove out its Teutonic rivals. In p. 52 we hear of a precious knave, just as we still use the adjective. In p. 39 a man frusshes a woman's mouth with his beard ; this French word, long before known in England, may have helped to bring brush into vogue ; the latter is a French word connected with the German borste. Lydgate talks of the Rolls (the Court) in p. 104 ; and in the next page he uses presently (forthwith), the sense still borne by the word in Yorkshire. His bargeman is in our day often thrown aside for bargee ; a curious instance of a French ending ousting its English brother. The French phrase, of necessité, occurs in p. 141 ; and apropos appears as exaample to purpoos, p. 146. The cry avaunt stands in p. 166. In the same page, what Wickliffe had called gelding, is written spado ; and there are the gamester's synk and sice, showing the French sound of the last. In p. 170 we light on paterfamilias, and in p. 187 comes a naturall fole ; the adjective, in some counties, still expresses idiot ; "a born natural." In p. 194 man is described as deriving many humoures from water ; humour at this time bore the sense of inclination in France. Lydgate does not talk of lenten and harvest, the old-fashioned terms for the seasons ; he uses Ver and Autumpne. In p. 212 respublica is translated by stuat ; in the same page we read of estaatys (the different orders of men). In p. 214 sacred appears as an Adjective ; in the year 1290 it was but a Participle. Our enjoy himself appears in p. 218 as rejoys hymself ; later in the Century the Pronoun was dropped after the verb. The poet says he must acounte for my talent ; this is a new sense of the Noun in English ; Hampole had used it for inclination ; the Parable of the Talents must have had some influence here. In p. 242 Aurora is made a dactyl ; England, as yet, had little horror of false quantities.

One of Lydgate's poems, dedicated to the Earl of Salisbury who fell at Orleans, is a translation of De Guileville's famous 'Pilgrimage' (published by Pickering in 1858). The poet has a peculiar contraction, that of telp for to helpe, and such like ; this is repeated in his later works. Adjectives are strung together, as, the noble hih havenely place, p. iii. ; this greet large sea ; there is the phrase ryht (straight) as any lyme, p. xii. We see ley trappys, lose his weye, in p. xlvi. Fortune lawes on the ryght syde (is favourable) ; we still say, make you laugh on the wrong side. Among the Romance words are nerve, mendicant, passingly, disdain, opposite, unction, jack (coat of mail), collusion, immutable, commission, inquisitive, unsure, duplicity, intermission. Lydgate, dropping his East Anglian usage, imitates Chaucer in forms like thilke and beth (sunt), also in prefixing y to the Passive Participle.

There are three pieces by Lydgate in 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' i. 13, 79, 156 ; they may date from 1430. Here we read of the lining (inside) of a bowl, p. 13 ; glassy is applied to eyes ; lumpish. In p. 157 a boy is warned not to pik his nose.

There is another piece of Lydgate's of this time in 'Religious and Love Poems' (Early English Text Society), p. 15. We see the new substantives crosebow and gosselyng. There is the new phrase to scape with life. There are the foreign words, bastylle, similitude, bagage (here meaning præda). We have the sentence, "odyous of olde been comparisonis."

Lydgate compiled certain Legends in 1433 (Horstmann, 'Altenglische Legenden') ; he here describes himself as old and enfeebled in his powers, p. 416. He continues his favourite practice of writing teschew for to eschew, etc. ; he has jerarchy for hierarchy, p. 415. The n is struck out ; Orrmin's scorcnen (exurere) becomes skorch, p. 452. Lydgate uses the two forms, Egelwyn and Ajllewyn, pp. 432, 431. He employs a Southern form, long obsolete, for the sake of his metre ; kneen (genua), p. 445. In the same page he talks of Bury toun, a pleonasm; burh (oppidum) had but lately dropped out of use. He employs unto my laste, p. 407, where breath is dropped. Among the Verbs are put off (repellere), put in mynde, be seen (apparere), unpyke locks, set at ese. The French en is prefixed to Teutonic roots, as, to enhang, p. 401. Among the Prepositions are at werre, go at liberte, be of fewe wordys. The with is used in a new sense; a man is brave with Tideus (equally with), p. 395. The between represents community of action; tween wind and wawe his barge almost brast, p. 401. The through is prefixed to a verb, probably in imitation of the Latin original, thurgh-perced, p. 448.

There is the verb rakk from the Dutch, p. 401; this torture was first brought into England in this Century.

The Romance words are carecte (character), a memento, furyous, eurous (heureux), predestynat, antiquity (old time), philologie, a preservatiff, stage of decrepitus, p. 419; in gros, transcend, thre tymes swinge (following), obstacle, spectacles (glasses). The old anker is now written anachorite, p. 417. We hear both of God's purveyance and of His provydence, pp. 426, 421. There is the French verb glace (slide), p. 436, which may have had some influence on our glancing off. A man is riht gentilmanly, p. 399; Udal, a hundred years later, was to write this gentlemanlike. The King is addressed as your hyh excellence, p. 440. We read, in p. 431, of the instruccioun given to a messenger; we now make this word Plural.

The heathen who harried England in the Ninth Century are called Sarseynes, p. 403.

The adverb aslope is found about this time; I have mislaid the reference.

There are some pieces in the 'Babees' Book' (Early English Text Society), which date from about 1430. Here we find where-sere, p. 302, a great shortening of where so ever; in p. 12 stands toilose (toilsome); here the old til or tul (laborare) bears its modern form. Among the Substantives are kervyng-knife, snof (of a candle), the over crust. The first hint of a nightgown is given in p. 315; and of fotemen (servants) in p. 320; "these run by the bridles of ladies sheen ;” not long before there is mention of hired pages. In p. 316 appears the zomon ussher, who sleeps at his Lord’s door ; the gromes (of the chamber) make the beds. In p. 307 a man should let others have þe way (take the pas of him). In p. 12 the new adjective medelus (meddlesome) appears. The word spare is used in a new sense in p. 325 ; a spare pece, something not in actual use. A man must not be too stiryng, or too pressing, p. 12 ; here the Participle is used like an adjective.

Among the Verbs are henge in honde (hang on hand), broken meat. The lose is used without an Accusative in p. 305 ; a man shall never lose by kindness. The Passive Voice is further developed in p. 307 ; zif þou be profert (proffered) to drink.

Among the French words are countynge house, p. 312 (room where money is checked), counturpynt (counterpane), clerk of the kitchen ; asseles patentis, p. 318, (seals patent), ferroure (farrier) ; sesours are here used for snuffers. The word enfaunt is used, as in France, for a boy, p. 303. There is the new phrase apiece ; foure pens a pece, p. 310. In p. 11 argue stands for wrangle. In p. 58 a man is bidden not to be nyce in clothing ; here the adjective adds the sense of fastidious, new in 1360, to its old meanings foolish and wanton.

As to rules of behaviour, men must not sup their potage with grete sowndynge ; they must not spit over or on the board, or pick their teeth, or bear knife to mouth, or lean on their elbows, or put meat into the salt cellar.

“ Who so ever despise þis lessoun ryȝt,
At borde to sitt he hase no myȝt ” (p. 303).

In the same page boys learn certain prayers ; among others, how to bless themselves with Marke, Mathew, Luke, and Jon ;—the old rime is still alive in our day. Accounts were kept in French, p. 317, where the forms taunt resceu, and taunt dispendu are enjoined. The adage that three is no company is enforced in p. 307 :

“ Be not þe thryd felaw for wele ne wo ;

the e is struck out, for Chaucer's meremaiden becomes mermaid, p. 78 ; this refers to the house where Shakespere's club long afterwards met. The form moevable is used in p. 127 for what some called mèveable, others moveable. Cirencester shrinks into Siscetre, p. 109. We have seen Cecile ; we now have our other form Cisily, p. 70. There is the proper name John of Nokys, p. 111. There are the substantives, rodelofte, yoman of the chambre, oure lady chapell, p. 114 ; in this last we see one of our few surviving Genitives that does not end in s. The verb mill, in connexion with coinage, may have been known in 1434 ; a cloth is mentioned with mylyngis, p. 101. The wise is now tacked on to nouns to form adverbs ; we see trestelwise in p. 102 ; crosswise is well known.

Among the Romance words are revenues, sygne manuell, flourdeluce, prymmer, exquies (funeral rites), decesse (morior). The old mobles now become mevable godes, p. 76. The word debita is Englished by duetees (duties), p. 88, in the Plural. In p. 95 we read of the mevable catell of bestall in a London will ; this shows how cattle was much later to express pecus in the South, as well as in the North. Bequests are made first to priests, then to every secundary and clerk of the church, p. 105. Our famous co is used for the first time, I think, in a compound made by Englishmen ; coexecutour stands in p. 100 ; hence co-mate, co-heir, etc. A Countess is particular in directing that two Greffons should bear up the scutcheon on her tomb, p. 117 ; supporters were now coming in, but were not yet strictly hereditary.

Among the 'Wills and Inventories' (Surtees Society), vol. ii., are some belonging to 1427 and 1429 ; also some letters of the same date, written by Salisbury, the King-maker's father. He uses both the forms, yaw and yow (vos) in one line, p. 70. The North still, as of old, loved coining Verbal Nouns ; we see his welcomyng (the welcome given him) ; my forthbryngyng (burial procession) ; there is hows of almouse, soon to be much shortened. Salisbury talks of hymself in his own person, an imitation of the Latin. Among the Verbs are shew kyndnesse, teke partie (part) ; Orrmin's unbyden (injussus) is repeated in the North, after a long interval; his love of the Passive voice reappears in Salisbury's thei are seen to. To hold for king was always good English; this is now extended to Passive Participles; Salisbury writes, have us for recomendid. The Earl has the strange phrase, he was here a (on) Monday was a VII. night, where it seems to be dropped before was, p. 70. A Newcastle merchant, making his will in 1429, uses the thoroughly Northern forms, pose (illa), tendes (decimæ). Salisbury writes, do me this ease as to len me yor chariott; here this seems to answer to tantum; and we see the source of Cranmer's "be so good as to," etc.; the Earl is fond of the old form len. A tale is told mor at large; there comes, at our last being with yow; in p. 78 stands at my weting (to my knowledge).

The French words are, terme of life, my goods moblez and unmoblez (personal and real), enfeffed in landes to my use, stufte of myn howses of offices as panetre and buttre (pantry and buttery, p. 75); we still talk of the offices of a house. In p. 70 stands save (safe) and suyrly; in p. 80 a man gives cleerly and freely, a new sense of the first adverb. There is the verb dispoynne; Scotch law prefers dispone to dispose. The old verb tent is written tender by Salisbury, p. 70, and this form lasted long in England.

There is much to be learnt from the Northern Wills, between 1426 and 1440, 'Testamenta Eboracensia' (Surtees Society). The first is that beginning, "I, dame Jhon Gascoigne," i. p. 410, the lady of the renowned Chief-Justice. The old pâwa (pavo) had been written poucok further to the South; it is here pacok, p. 420; showing the double sound of the old aw. The former caudron is now seen as caldron, p. 419. There is the new noun salt salar, and the new verbal phrases thanket be God! þai havand Gode before þer eghen, ii. 76. In ii. 20 stands rather or (citius quam); in our day, we sometimes hear sooner nor. Among the French words are, a party goune (hence party-coloured); extend is driving out stretch, ii. 20. The Chief-Justice's wife prefixes dame to her Christian name; this legal title has lasted for more than 400 years.

There is the Latin in primis at the beginning of a sentence, ii. 20.

In the 'Paston Letters,' from 1426 to 1440, we remark the Norfolk use of x for s, as xal for sal (shall). In p. 30 stands I am your man (servant), a phrase still existing. There is the adjective ungodely (malus), p. 32; the word had before been used as an adverb. In p. 40 we read that our Lordes bytte (beat) the French, a new sense of the verb; in iii. 417 comes the phrase to fele a man; where we should now sound him. There are the foreign words, synister and taylles (tallies). A Lord is addressed in a letter both as your reverens and your lordesship, iii. 416; the former of these phrases is in our time set apart for the clergy.

There is a deed in the 'Plumpton Letters,' p. li., bearing date 1432. A representative of certain parties is called their man; and we read of a man of counsell learned in the law, showing how Gower arrived at his sense of counsel. We see accious reall and personall.

In Gregory's Chronicle for these years we see Jane used instead of the usual form Joan for Henry the Fourth's Queen. We know that we pronounce the name St. John as Sinjon; in p. 168 we find Syn Jorge. The three heads of our Common Law are named in p. 160; the men who presided over the Kyngys Benche, the Comyn Place, and the Kyngys Chekyr. Mention is made of the Downys; the sea is referred to, not the hills. In p. 167 we read of a pounde weyght of golde, a new phrase for "gold that weighed a pound." The old Adjective lewke becomes leuke warme, p. 166. The Verbs are, he bare uppe his trayne, make a mocke of, p. 178. An Adverb is made a Preposition, all acrossse hys II schylderis (shoulders), p. 166; this, probably due to the French à travers, is in the year 1429. The Chronicler loves to tell of good eating; we find here the French words, custarde, gely, esteryge (ostrich). The word raysonys is used in the English, not the French sense, and grayne is used for corn, p. 181. The word prefas appears in p. 166, which lasted here without a rival, until some zealous Teuton in our own day first printed forewords, a word used by our forefathers for pacta. The Parliament was concludyd (ended), p. 182; in p. 176 comes the curious phrase, "to banyſch a man the town;" a double Accusative, "forbid him the town," had come earlier.

We find a long English paper of the year 1426 in the 'Rolls,' vol. iv. pp. 409-411. There is the new phrase, Justices in the Quorum. In p. 410 we see the Northern es beginning to supplant the Southern eth in the highest quarters; he comes is found in a Court document. In the same volume we find besturr me, fittith him (deceit). A well-known phrase of ours comes in p. 435; the siege of Orleans was taken in hand, God knoweth by what advis. It is in p. 433 that the title of the Squeers of English History is earned by Warwick, in his proposals anent the chastisement of the future founder of Eton College. The French words are agreeably (cheerfully), conclude pees. Cardinal Beaufort is called the King's grete uncle, p. 438; the old eme was soon to vanish altogether. It is curious how the foreign words have intruded into our very hearths, as it were.

In vol. v. p. 318 are the petitions for the year 1427. We find a curious idiom, well known in our days, in p. 322, he schulde have been and procured, etc.; the been, I suppose, stood for gone. In p. 327 the young King is fer goon (far gone) in growth; we now limit this phrase to love and liquor. In p. 326, instead of the old natheles, comes howe were it that; howbeit was soon to appear. We had always coupled from and beyond; we now have from over þe sea, p. 318. The French words are, denisein, and ye agreed you to, etc.; the later pourvey for stands for the Latin provide for, p. 318. There is a long discussion in 1427 by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the title given to Duke Humphrey: "(we) devised unto you a name different from oþer counsaillers, nought þe name of Tutour, Lieutenant, Governour, nor of Regent, . . . but þe name of Protectour and Defensour, þe which emporteth a personell duetee of entendance to þe actuell defense of þe land, as well ayenst þenemys utward, yf cas required, as ayenst Rebelles inward, yf any were, þat God forbede," vol. iv. p. 326. In the year 1429 raise is spelt reze, vol. iv. p. 343, showing how z has encroached upon s, even in Teutonic words. We see the substantives see cole, fredomys (liberties), clothemakyng; a zern (yarn) chopper is coupled with a regratour, p. 349; perhaps our jobber may have something to do with the former word. Barbour's Scottisman makes way for Scottyshman, p. 360; this was to be contracted still more. There is the new Adjective weiable; Hampole's new suffix to Teutonic nouns was coming South. In p. 365 comes the phrase, a vessel laden of c tonne tite and over; the word piht, the German dihte, is Englished by solidus in the 'Promptorium Parvulorum'; a ship is said to be tight, when no water can get in; water-tight was to come in 1550. In p. 360 stands oon zere with another. The Verbs are bryng downe þe pris, take an action against; there is a wonderful change of idiom in p. 343, thair resones beyng herd, the Ablative Absolute; here being stands before a Passive Participle. Orrmin's forthwith appears in London, p. 343. The French words are quinzisme and disme, grants made by the Commons; prefer a man to office; things passe and be agreed be the Counseill, p. 343; to pass accomptes, to pass a yeft be dede, to condescende unto hem; this old law term is still used in Scotland; to enter thair advys of recorde, p. 344; to present an offence.

As to the years 1430 and 1432, we see that Gower's doaire has now become dower; the ozener of 1340 is now seen as awener (owner). In p. 375 comes the female name Joyous, our Joyce. We hear in p. 405 that wines are wel drinking; this is in truth a Verbal Noun, which looks like a Participle; the wines are in such a state that they give pleasure when swallowed; the idiom is something like that of a debt is owing. In p. 376 a man is made party to something. In p. 385 we see howbeit that, found in Rymer's documents about the same time. Instead of moreover stands overe that, p. 369. The French words are, interesse (interest), your Roial Excelence, oratrice, gauge. The law term, to joyn issue, appears in p. 376.

In the year 1433 we remark how the Standard English, spoken in London, was more and more coming into vogue, as the language of public affairs; the distant shires framed their petitions more and more on the London model; Parliament was enforcing unity in speech as well as in politics. For instance, in the Salopian petition, p. 476, there is little that is provincial, except uch (quisque) and oo (unus). In p. 423 the abash of 1303 becomes bash, whence we got our bashful; in p. 475 the old drunen-ian appears as drowen (drown); the writer evidently thought that drow was the root of his Infinitive. There are the new Substantives Town Clerk and nynesse; nearness was to come fifty years later. There is the new phrase by likelihod, not like-liked as in Chaucer; we have preferred hood to head. Among the Verbs we find make offris (offers), put in writyng, have relation to, bere voice (have a voice, p. 479). We see that the Northern sense of still (adhuc) has come down to London from the North. A translation of the French sur ousts the Old English for in things done upone her accounte, p. 477. Much is dropped in the sentence a robe, price xx^s, in the same page; the English seemed to be intent on saving their breath. We see, in p. 423, a sentence begin with Memorand', pat, etc. There are the new French words, extraordinarie, scrupill, to retaile, assistants. There are the phrases, due allowance, to article a request, sue to a man for, etc., truly and indifferently (justè) choose, save him harmeles, the Statute in such case ordeymed. We see rynge a belle 3 peell, p. 478; the last word is properly apele; in the same page attheynte is used of a trifling fault; the verb was to bear a far more serious meaning in the bustling times twenty years later.

Turning to the years 1435, 1436, 1437, we find the new Substantive utterance; French endings were now much in vogue for Teutonic roots. The phrase "get her lyvyng," p. 491, has come down from the North; lyfode was as yet the common phrase in the South. We hear of the Speker, of gavelkynde, of the mene Hans townes, p. 493; of a ship of a c tonne portage, p. 501; we should now alter the last word into burden. There is a fresh idiom in p. 498, the trespas done by Richard takyng her; Richard is not in the Genitive, and therefore takyng may not perhaps be a Verbal Noun. We have seen being set before a Passive Participle; another step is made in p. 491, the Court beyng sitting. In p. 486 stands seisid as of frehold; one of the many needless insertions of as. In a Lancashire petition in p. 498 the phrase and þen þere is used in describing a crime; our "then and there;" the Northern sho (illa) is used here. The noun rape is now used in our legal sense; it had hitherto meant only hurry. The French words are, heynous, fee simple, keyes (quays). We see enquerre (inquiry) with inquisition in the same page, 487; our tongue is very rich in having in many cases both original Latin forms, and their offspring as corrupted by the Northern Gauls. In p. 490 the verb defait expresses perdere, our undo. In p. 497 stands atteint of high treason, the new serious sense of the verb. The French had long before talked of manœuvring a vine in the sense of the Latin colere; in p. 500 we find this verb under its Picard form menuring, our manure. The old pass (superare) was now being encroached upon by excede.

In the year 1439 we see the substantive brode clothe; ships be at rode (in the roads), p. 29; this is the Dutch sense of the noun. In p. 16 yoman stands for a particular class of the commons; in p. 32 it is used for an archer in the wars. We hear of the shire of Salop, p. 17. The verbs are, put up a petition, ley down plowes (like our put down a carriage), bye at the first hand, p. 32. The Northern phrase falle to robbery is in p. 32. The former o lesse now becomes yn lesse than, our unless, p. 15. The French words are feoffes, the Corporation of Plymouth, the honour of Tutbury, usuell, omitte. In p. 5 comes the Latin form to be deducte; we have now the Infinitive form deduce as well. We see finance in p. 22 with its old French sense of money payment. In p. 32 stands the phrase to garbal spicery; it here means to cleanse; the Arabic algarbal and the Spanish garbillo express a sieve; we sift out what is best for our purpose, leaving the rest; and thus we garble facts.¹ There is the old verb juperd in p. 33; our penny-a-liners now fling aside the Classic English form and rejoice in the barbarous jeopardize. We lately saw the French form tesmoign; in p. 33 we have the Latin letters testimoniall. The term Baillies was used in England as well as in Scotland; see p. 33.

A few words may be picked from Halliwell's 'Royal Letters,' between 1425 and 1440. The Northern lurdain has come down to London, p. 117; also Wickliffe's intransitive gather. The Lollards, the first English Dissenters, are called God's traitors and ours; in connexion with them we hear of conventicles, p. 118, a phrase applied for ages to Dissenters' assemblies both in England and Scotland; accomplice also appears. In p. 118 stands ye have great cause and matter to, etc.; these words were synonyms in the earliest French.

In the papers of Coldingham Priory, between 1429 and 1440, we remark the old name Cuthbert altered into Cudbart, p. 109; hence comes Cuddie. A Scotchman writes about the kirkmen (sacerdotes), our churchmen. The Prior of Durham is addressed as zour Lordschip in p. 109; in another part of the same letter gude lordsship is used for favour. One letter is signed, be zors (by yours) in all thyng, David Home of Wederburn (p. 109). He translated the French form and set the fashion to future English writers. Among the Verbs are, oure chargyng (overcharging). The Active Participle in ynng is supplanting the old Northern and in Durham. In p. 110 stands as to your fee to be (such) I agree me; the to be was afterwards to be altered into being, another instance of the confusion between the Infinitive and the Verbal Noun. In p. 104 stands the clause of reservation; (something) all way oute taken, the Ablative Absolute. A knight is addressed in p. 114 as wirshipfull Sir.

On turning to Rymer's documents, between 1429 and 1440, we see the river Loire under the forms Lyre and Leyr, p. 724; a well-known province appears as Langdocke, showing that the French had begun to clip the last vowels of langue. Cardinal Beaufort wishes to have certain speres and bowes at wages, p. 420; here the weapon stands for its wielder. In p. 635 Henry VI. talks of the re-taking of a truce; this is an early instance of re being prefixed to an English root; we see in French law documents re-eyant. In p. 421 is the phrase for oo cause or other; in the next page we hear of the thriddes or other gaines of werre, due to the Crown, an early hint of our way of expressing fractions; the Numeral seems to be turned into a noun. Among the verbs are, beryng date of this day, havyng regard to it, lay by a thing (put on one side), yeve trouble (an early instance of this noun; it was usually travail), put undir arest, answer for (be responsible). The Passive voice comes forward, as usual; the kyng may be sent unto, p. 727. We see howbeit, with no that following, p. 424; under conditions is in p. 420. The French words are Cruciat (Crusade), Capitainship, to estyme (value), proves (proofs), Doctour of lawe, populus, to convene and assemble (in a Scotch document). In p. 420 a cause is solicited; hence our solicitors; the word had appeared in France in the foregoing Century, and soon came to be used of law matters. In the same page stands he is agreed to licence; in p. 421 he agreeth him to it; it took some little time to settle these idioms. In p. 424 stands they entenden the subversion, a meaning borne by the French verb 200 years earlier; further on we see, to entend with the Cardinal (come to an understanding)—of these senses the first alone survives in our mouths. In p. 426 comes he treted (induced) him to goo, he and his retenue (here, by the way, the last he ought to be him); further on stands entreat (tractare). In p. 727 we find pleine refusing; hence our plain dealing; this sense has been lost in France but kept in England. In the next page we see places enclaved; the wars with France were bringing in many new words; enclave is a word well known to readers of newspapers, since Napoleon III. took to rectifying boundaries.

In the Political Songs of this period ('Master of the Rolls,' ii. 146-205) the chief point of interest is the long poem on English trade, compiled in 1436 by some fore-runner of Gresham. The author has a high respect for the late Richarde of Whitingdone, calling him "the sonne of marchaundy, that loodesterre and chefe chosen floure, p. 178. The Old English mæddre (rubia) now appears as madder.

The d rounds off a word at the end; the French riban takes the form of ruband, p. 173; both ribbon and ribband are used in our day. The k in the middle is struck out; market appears as mart, p. 179. A Romance ending is fastened once more to a Teutonic root; hinderance comes in p. 176. A Latin word is literally translated by thinge publique, p. 178. There are the nouns, cheffe staple, swerd of astate, sea keeping. In p. 175 comes the phrase XII pens in the pounce. Among the Adjectives we remark mery Yngland for the first time, p. 156; this was often repeated in the Robin Hood ballads. Mention is made of Highe Duch; as gode as gone (lost), p. 187; this last idiom is a little changed since the year 1280. In p. 193 stands I can say no bettere. The verb pulle takes the sense of bibere, p. 169. In p. 176 the poet thus delivers himself, they wolde wypen our nose with our owne sleve; this proverbe is homely but true. The last clause is a foretaste of the favourite apologetic phrase of our penny-a-liners, "according to the vulgar adage;" they probably think the author of 'Don Quixote' the most underbred of writers. There is a new adverb in p. 203, slugly to sleep; perhaps our snugly may have some connexion with this. Among the French words are found bucram, policie (political interest), expensis, peasemaker, for verry shame, rounde aboute enviroyn, her chaunge (speaking of traders). In p. 187 metal is fyned; the French word was affiner. In the same page a post is spoken of in the old sense of pillar; Ireland is here called a post under England.

Here is a flaming outburst in praise of Henry V. (p. 200); the poet most likely thought Teutonic words vulgar, when so high a theme was in hand; he may be compared with Chaucer, when the latter writes of the Virgin—

“What had this kynge of hie magnificens,
Of grete corage, of wysdome and prudence,
Provision, forewitte, audacité,
Of fortitude, justice, agilité,
Discrecioun, subtilite avisifenesse,
Atemperance, noblesse, and worthynesse,
Science, proesce, devocioun, equityté,
Of moste estate his magnanimité!”

This poem upon English trade leads us to consider next the documents in use in the City of London about 1440, such as the oath taken by apprentices and by newly-made freemen. These may be found in Blades' 'Life of Caxton,' pp. 145, 146. Here we see shopholder (keep has since encroached upon hold), lotte and skotte (transposed by us), to have right and lawe; when an animal is given law, he possesses a right to a certain privilege. We see the feliship, not the Company, of the Mercers. There is the rising idiom, rules made and to be made, the Past and the Future combined; also, bere your parte; hence the later bear a hand, do your part. The Romance words are, secrets (in the Plural, which is new), to emplede men.

An English version of the 'Gesta Romanorum' (Early English Text Society) was made about the year 1440, perhaps not far from Salop, for we see forms like mery, beld, (ædificare), thelke, p. 90; birde, 106; huyr, p. 229; a phrase of Piers Ploughman, first and furþermost, is repeated in p. 228. The most Southern forms are, i-be (the Past Participle often keeps its prefix), lungen (lungs), buþ, clupe, I not; both iubet and iebet (gibbet); the Southern u comes even into contrucion and conducion. This is the last long work with strongly marked Southern forms. The Northern forms are, thou was, kyttling, what kynne, þou lies, even to the bone, steyne (lapidare), trays (trace). The English translations of the original were printed rather later, and went through about twenty-five editions within 210 years. The treatise must have been in the hands of all that aspired to be good preachers, thanks to the theological moral appended to every tale; and I suspect that, through Tyndale, these Gesta have had an influence upon the diction of our English Bible. Some of the phrases here found are, similitude, transgression, have indignacion, have his desire, break the ship, set in ward, sey on, unmutable, bowels (pity), ensample, how that, to her-ward, drew nigh, babe, ordeyn for a law, hole of his sickness, now (the Greek oun), put trust in, anhungred, astonied, Sirs. In this work cross and dog are employed, to the exclusion of the old rode and hound. The Teutonic words, now obsolete, are very few, perhaps not more than sixty in the whole of the bulky treatise. Thirty years later a lasting barrier was to be set up against the further loss of old words.

As to letters, the a replaces e, as wariour (bellator). What had hitherto been usually written schet (clausus) now becomes our shut, p. 127.

Among the Substantives we see deth-bedde, stoner (lapidary), lyme-pyt. A judge, about to sentence a man to death in p. 102, calls him dere frend. A man calls a woman deer love, p. 220. There is the phrase, hillis and dalis, p. 134; the first word used to formerly be downs. The Old English han-craed now becomes cockis crowe, p. 298. An Emperor, angry with his brother, addresses him as þou zoman! p. 318; in p. 311 carle is used, like the Southern chorle, for a mere boor, opposed to a rich man. In p. 248 stands a foule pleye.

As to the Pronouns, there is what of that? p. 255.

Among the Verbs stand come to soth (the truth) of this mater, make lamentacion, make contynance as (quasi), rested never till he had, etc., put a-bak fro, go to werke, take honours, p. 176; do a good torne for me, keep his bedde, begge my brede. We have come to (accedere), p. 5, with no noun following; hence our naval hove to. In p. 220 stands þow makest hit so straunge to me; we should now say, make such a stranger of me. In p. 319 we have sette up sayle; set sail had come earlier. An Impersonal verb governs the Accusative in p. 239; a man speaks of rain falling on his eyes, and says, lete hit reyne hem (them) oute of the hede. A noun is turned into a verb; pes was felashpid among hem, p. 135. There is the strange coupling of Teutonic and Romance synonyms in p. 81; dampnyd to the foulest deth þat I can deme. We have seen verbs like order and suffer followed by a Passive Infinitive; we now have, in p. 174, he coveyith a man to be couplid to him; our verb want, used in this sense, is now very common. In p. 267 stands if it be come to this poynt; hence our "it comes to this."

Among the Adverbs we find hiely plesid, go forth (forward) and bakward, told how it was with (them), howe is þis? The old Adverb manli, used in 1310, is thrown aside for manfulli, p. 229. We see in þe end, the on ende of 1220; many now find that this is a poor phrase by the side of eventually. There is the unusual phrase in p. 12 used of a wronged husband, his wife tooke an oper undir him. This may mean "shielding herself under his reputation;" it can here hardly mean "under his nose." We have in p. 74, lok þe dore upon him; with the usual hostile sense of this preposition. There is the new phrase, he thought to himselfe, p. 112; this is very different from Wickliffe's she saide with ymne hir self, the Gothic in sis (Mat. ix. 21). We know the old French construction to be seised of; this is now further extended; I shall purveye me of another frende, p. 130. In p. 68 stands thou liest in thi hed; we should here use teeth; the in here is instrumental, as "in Adam all die." The French and Italians use per or par, coupled with throat, for the in first quoted.

In p. 10 stands the old saw, of too evelis þe lasse evill is to be chosyn, where evils replaces Chaucer's harms. The one new Scandinavian word found here is scroggi (rough, covered with bushes), p. 19, whence our scraggy; it is written scourgy in p. 20.

The French and Latin words are, per consequens, specius, governance, infect, credence, moralite (moral of fable), naturely, cocautrice, pronosticacion, profetis (profits), corpulent, sugiestion. In p. 2 a wizard is called a mysterman; the term given by American travellers to Indian sorcerers is mystery man. The word bowelis, as in the Bible, is here in constant use for miser cordia. In p. 30 it is said that Christ has ordered each man to keep the saboth day; this is the first English instance, I think, of the Hebrew word being applied to the Christian Sunday. A man of low birth calls himself a por fellow, p. 122. In p. 123 fantasiis, changing its meaning, expresses "knickknacks." In p. 162 we have, pursue the law ayenst him; in the next page have goode lawe upon him; in our "take the law of him," the of must stand for on. In p. 215 save youre Reverens is addressed to an Emperor. The French per dieu comes into the text in p. 224; two pages further on we have a very French idiom, O Lorde, that ther buy manye that, etc.; our how many there be; the French form unnumberable is in p. 241. In p. 248 Sir is for the first time addressed by a man to an animal; a man thus speaks to his lion, Sey, sir! jeo vous pri, have i-do, sir! In p. 260 a man is communid (receives the communion). We see such words as diliciousites and dilectabilites. There is servitute, a direct imitation of the Latin, p. 44; and statute (statua), p. 27. The Old English spend makes way for the Latin expend in p. 53. In p. 105 we read of nedefull necessariis. In pp. 108 and 109 Jubiter and Jovem are alike used as the Nominative. The French and Latin sometimes stand side by side; as febilnesse and fragilitee, p. 241. In p. 43 an Emperor is addressed as thou by an inferior; we saw in 1415 something like this. The Englishman sometimes does not trouble himself to translate his Latin text; he talks in p. 237 of kinge assireorum; there is also congruli, impet (impetus), and quadragesme.

In the year 1440 a Dominican, living at Lynne, wrote an English and Latin dictionary, which he called the Promptorium Parvulorum (Camden Society). He tells us in his preface that he followed the Norfolk dialect alone, which he had used from his childhood. He has all Chaucer's hatred of inaccurate copyists; he objects to interpolations such as honde pro hande, nose pro nese; "let the transcriber write hande vel hond, nese vel nose." Some of the friar's terms are still current in his beloved shire, though not elsewhere. Few old writers have been privileged to have such a modern editor as our present author has enjoyed in Mr. Albert Way.

There are certain peculiar words and forms that remind us of the 'Handlyng Synne,' compiled not far from Lynne, 130 years earlier. Such are dawntyn (fovere), many maner wyse, mattok, eke name, nygun, solowin (maculare), squyllare (lavator), stresse, tysin, geinsay. The prut! Manning's scornful interjection, reappears as ptrot or trut, p. 505.

As to the Vowels, a is sometimes clipped at the beginning of a word; atyre and tyre, arayment and rayment, are alike found. We see the broad sound of the a in mageram, which we now write marjoram; what we now call sap is here written saappe. The a supplants i and y; masch-in and carlok stand for the old misc-an (miscere), and cyrlic the Teutonic bloo (lividus), and the Romance blewe (cæruleus) carefully distinct. The o is inserted, to mark off hoope (circulus) from hope (spes); it is struck out in heron, which becomes hern. The twofold sound of oy is here plainly seen, as in bu and bey; we have poynntyng (punctacio), and poynntyng or peynntyng (pictura). The aveer (property) of 1390 appears here as havure, this oi being the connecting link; our behaviour was soon to appear. We know how often v was written as u; we have here the forms recuryng and remoun written for recovering and removen; the givegove of 1220 appears here as gugaw, our gewgaw. So the govel (gafol) of 1230 is now seen as goul, devil as dewle; there are both the forms chavilbon and chaulbon (jowl bone). The Scotch use doos for columbæ; in this book columbar appears as dowys hoole.

As to Consonants, the b is inserted, for emyrie is seen not only as eimeri, but as eimbre, our ember; it is curious in this book to see many words change, as it were, before our eyes. We have here the form bedrabylyd, which we have since turned into bedraggled; draggled is found in Gavin Douglas; in the present work we find drubly (turbidus), the Scotch drumly; a good instance of the connexion between b and m. The form snipe appears instead of the old snite, which Lydgate had written snyghte. There is a very late instance of the old hn at the beginning of a word: hnoppe, our nap of a coat. Chaucer's chirk is here encroached upon by the new form chirp. The word nothak (hacker of nuts) has not yet been softened into nuthatch, and peske is formed from the foreign pesche (peach). There is muschyl as well as muskyl; we now drop the k when sounding the word. Carle and chorle stand side by side; also ketil and chetil, pik and piche (pix). The Old English sc sometimes holds its ground; thus sceol appears as sculle, and has not yet become shool. The c is prefixed, for the former rimpil (ruga) is found also as crympylle; the c is inserted in the East Anglian way, as in squalter; it replaces h, as in quysper, quele, and other words. The k replaces p; we have the clakke as well as the clappe of a mill; this change had appeared in the 'York Mysteries.' The k replaces t; we see the French name hadot of a certain fish turned into haddock. The old Relative whykke keeps its place beside the corrupt whyche; the old ece (dolor) appears both as ache and ake (the former sound was favoured by Kemble). The ch encroaches on c, the French s, in launch. Gower's was (aqua) is seen as wasche; our author well knew the Wash. The h is docked, for hreol (alabrum) is cut down to reel; owing to this h failing, our word for mutire became confused with our terms for humiliare and flammare, all alike being low. As to g, the old egg (ovum) had hitherto been softened into ey or ei, almost without an exception, throughout England; but here we find the two forms ey and eg. In this work we find the three forms, agayne, azeyne, and geyn, as in geymbyng. It is to East Anglia that England owes the preservation of the old hard g in so many words, as gate, give, gainsay. It was East Anglia that kept drag (trahere) alive, while all other shires leant to dray and draw; even the French alayan (allay) is in this book turned into Teutonic aleggyn. The warnish of former English writers now appears as garnish. We see gest (hospes) followed by geeste (romance); the g in the last word may have been softened; the old gist (spuma) is altered into zeest; lawere and lawzer are both found. The gh is dropped; there are both the forms trough and trou. The d is doubled, as ruddi for rudi; it is inserted, for we have here the two forms hegge and hedge; the old lœnan (commodare) now becomes leendyn. The d at the beginning is clipped, for we find the form spiteful, not despiteful. On the other hand, affodylle has not yet the d prefixed to it. The d replaces t, as clodde (gleba) for clotte; it replaces þ, as in rodyr (rudder). We see dunch used as well as bunch (our punch) for tundere; while dunche and lonche are two forms of the word for sonitus; a curious instance of the interchange of consonants. In some shires a horse's kick is still called a lunge. The t replaces þ, as tol-pyn; it is added to a word; the claré of 1280 now becomes claret; it is inserted, for Wickliffe's swalien appears as swalterin, our swelter. There are the two forms thretti and thirti; the latter must have come down from the North. The old lætta now becomes latthe, our lath; and the old cudele (sepia) becomes cotul, our cuttle fish; it is odd that we have to supplement this noun with fish. The l is added, as in stoppell, hovel; it is inserted, as in wyndelas (windlass). The l replaces r, as mellow for the Old English mearu (mollis); lorel for Gower's lorer (laurus); it replaces s, for Lydgate's primerol becomes prymerose. The n is prefixed, as in neke name for eke name; newte for the ewte of 1390, the old efete (lacerta). On the other hand, napron was to lose its first letter a hundred years later. The n is struck out, for there is elle, our ell, as well as the old elne; so we find halpworthe for halpeni worth, p. 492; the w in this word was to vanish 170 years later. The word incenser loses its first syllable and becomes consere. The n at the beginning is clipped; we see owmpere (umpire) as well as the true nowmpere. There is the bird martnet, where Shakespere later substituted l for n. The n is inserted; the popagai of 1390 becomes popynjay; it is struck out, as in rose mary (rose maryne); it makes way for m, as mygreyme (megrim) from emigranea. The r is added, as webbare (textor) for webbe. The r in the middle is struck out, as prokecye (proxy) for procuracy; we have already seen foster. The s is added, as in tydyngys (rumor). As to scratch, here first found, it is a compound of the two forms scratten and cracchen. The w is inserted; the old wermod becomes wyrmwode. We see, in p. 68, the first instance of our replacing h by wh, whence come whole and whore; whote (calidus) is here set down for hot.

I will point out a curious instance of mistaken philology. The old mucgwgrt, our mugwort, was in some shires written modirwort; an author, inditing a few years before this time, thus explains what seemed to him to be an English corruption, "Mogwort, al on as seyn some, modirwort: lewed folk þat in manye wordes conne no ryzt sownynge, but ofte shortyn wordys, and changyn lettrys and silablys, þey coruptyn þe o into u and d into g, and syncopyn i, smytyn away i and r, and seyn mugwort."¹ crelle (creel), bulbrysche, p. 244, cranke (haustrum), crykke (spasmus), hull (of ship), locker, sound (of a fish), sinke (latrina), starche, coite (quoit), teal, whyrlgyge, codlyng (gadus), whytyng (piscis). The chuffe (rusticus), found here, has given birth to the chuffy (clownish), still heard in Yorkshire. There are new combinations, as almesshowse, barly corne, barlymele, bondogge (bandog, canis vinctus), brasyere, brydelime, brood arowe, chese-kake, cokerelle (a Shakesperian word), cokkys combe, dullarde, downe goynge, etyng howse, fly flappe, fote steppe, hange manne, howskepare, hornpype, huswyfery, kechyme knave, kyngys fyschare, loksmythe, madnesse, mousare, neverthryfte (a wastour), owte caste (or refuse, Wickliffe's outcastyng), pan-kake, penne knyffe, ryng wyrme, roof tree, schavyngys, schoyng horne, silkwirm, suklyng, swerde man (swordsmen), sunne ryse, thundyr clappe, tol-pyn, upholder (the tradesman, who was to become upholster forty years later), wagstert (wagtail), waterpot, weyfarere, whyte led, whytlymyng, wyldefyyr; Trevisa's twilyghting now becomes twilyghte. The old hengest (equus) now gives birth to heyncemann, soon to become henchman. The word neb had lost its former meaning facies; it here expresses nothing but rostrum; it was soon to give birth to the nib of a pen. The word wytche may here translate either magus or maga; but we find wisard elsewhere. The old bysynesse keeps its Southern meaning of diligencia: the further sense of negotium may be seen in p. 30. The honourable sense of bonde (colonus) had vanished; the word can now express nothing but servus; lente can now no longer English ver, as of old; it is reserved to translate quadragesima. We see fitin (mendacium), whence our fib seems to come. Gower's comlihede is now replaced by comlinessse. There is a fashion of adding French endings to Teutonic roots; we find here hangement (suspensio); we have seen certain words ending in ard. The ster was no longer a peculiarly female ending; browstar may now stand for a man; maltestere, appearing for the first time, is applied to either man or woman, and it is the same with webstare; tapstare to women only; thakstare to men only. The ling is added, for the old star becomes sterlyng, our starling. We see the renowned proper name Gybonn used as a synonym for Gilbert; the form Bete is given as the English for Beatrix; the Betty of our days is supposed to express a longer name, and may have been confused with Bessy. The forms Kyrstyone and Crystyone are used as proper names, with the transposition to be found in cers and ress. There is the unusual word marche (nanus), whence Murchison must come. Barbour's new Celtic word stabbe (vulnus) has arrived at Lynn on its way to London; there is also his owtyngge. The English telt is still found, as well as its foreign supplanter tent. There is here an attempt to derive blunderer from blunt worker; in the same way cymbal appears as chymme belle. The imitation of French compounds, first seen in 1280, now produces lykdyshe (scurra); a hundred years later this kind of coinage was to be in great favour. We light upon the clumsy nouns, gaderynge togedur (collectio), comynge-too (adventus), to-falle (appendicium); the last is something like a lean-to. There are both the forms byynge-azen (redempcio), and the neater agayn-byer (redemptor). We read in p. 358 of a forthebryngar fro zouthē to age (nutricius); one of the last attempts at compounding with forth. In this lexicon, when an English word bears two or more senses, it is carefully repeated, as bede or bedys (numeralia), and bede (oracio); different Latin words are given for fela or felowe (socius), when reference is made to companionship at meat, in travail, in office, in walking, in school, in guilt. So as to the word kervare (carver), three senses are given; referring to meals, to a trade, and to the oldest sense of all (obsolete in our day), the simple meaning of cutting anything whatever. We see here lyvelode with its old meaning victus, and with its later meaning of 1340, donativum. The word loome still keeps its old general sense of instrumentum, which we have lost; there is also its new particular sense loome of webbarys crafte (telarium). The word pley stands for ludus, then for spectaculum; the pley that endeth with sorrow is called tragedia, and the pley that endeth with mirth is called comedia. Next we find pleyferē, which was to be replaced by Tyndale's playfellow. The old camp (pugna) can now express nothing higher than a match at football; camping land is still known in East Anglia. The verb rædan (interpretari) and redan (legere) are now confused; and there is a third verb redyn formed from the old hreed (arundo). The verb fret had fifty years earlier changed from edere to corrodere; a pain may now be called a fretting. We find not only hanging (suspensio) but some new verbal nouns, the hangings of a hall, a church, or a tent, each with its Latin synonym. The new word bahche (our batch) is formed from baking loaves. The word comb expresses, not only favus, crista, and pecten, but also strigilis, "of curraynge." The old frame no longer means commodum, but expresses fabrica. It is curious to find lerare or lernare Englishing both doctor and discipulus, a strange confusion. The word pype may now be used of organs; the substantive pul (tractus) is formed from the verb. The word stone (calculus) now expresses a disease. We see the old sailyard; and zerd is moreover used as a synonym for a rope. There are both the old ruddok and the new redbreste.

Among the new Adjectives are fit (congruus), irksum. We have seen lucius (luscious); we now have lush (laxus). There is the old lothli, and also the new lothsum. We saw great-hearted in 1220; we now find lyght hertyd, lyght handyd, grey heryd; there is also yvel menyngge, a synonym for false. The oldest meaning of seli appears for the last time, I think; for it is here translated by felix; the word's history from first to last has been most curious. The adjective onsyghty stands for invisibilis, very different from the later unsightly. The old Scandinavian werre, the Scotch waur, had by this time died out of East Anglia; here nothing but werce stands for pejor. The old dæft had meant mitis, but now deft is set down as hebes, the Scotch daft; the York folk had given an exactly opposite meaning to deft. Wickliffe's lifthi (vitalis) here takes the sense of vivax, and is moreover spelt lively. The word bold has both a good and a bad sense; audax and presumptuosus; a girl is by us still called "a bold thing." The old ruful bears two meanings; full of pity, and full of pain. The old drededefulle means both timidus and terribilis. We find fayre first in the sense of pulcher; then as amœnus, applied to weather; then comes fayre spekar (orator); the meaning æquus is not here given to the word. The adjective drye is applied to kine that give no milk. The word fresche means, not only recens, but redimitus, and is explained "joly and galaunt," as in Wickliffe; in our day, a man in his cups is said to be rather fresh. We read of myry weder (hence comes an English surname); this sense of jucundus long lingered in the word, as in "it was never merry in England since," etc. The phrase opun synnare is rendered by puplicanus, and is explained to be "one without shame." One of the three meanings of scharpe here given is velox, which explains our "look sharp." We read of smal wyne; we now apply the adjective to beer. Many new substantives are formed by adding nesse to adjectives; we have here bestylynnesse, craftylynnesse (industria), coragyowsnesse, p. 422, feythefulnesse, fewenesse, kendlynesse, preciowsnesse, slynesse, synfulnesse, werdlynesse (mundialitas). Even Chaucer's bountè becomes here bontyvasnesse.

The old usage of Adverbs was now forgotten, for these are lengthened out by a needless ly at the end, as asunderly, astrayly; we see onknowyngly for the first time. The Salopian phrase of 1350, in þe mene while, now loses its first two words. The author points out clearly that agayne conveys the two very different meanings contra and retro. We see the phrase owte, owt, described as an Interjection; while owt, applied to a candle, as in 1300, is translated extinctus. Sohowe (soho) is called a hunting cry.

As to the Verbs, the author repeats some of the commoner sort very often, coupling them with prepositions or adverbs; thus we have been aboute, yn bysynes; been aqweyntyd (noscere), and many others; so goo wronge is but one out of fifteen headings. It is plain that grow is encroaching on wax; we have growe olde, growe yonge, and others; in fact, the grow now answers to the esco at the end of Latin verbs, though we still find sowryn as well as growe sowyr. The verb make is largely exemplified, as make clene, make drunkyn, make fat, make knowyn, make perfytte, make pleyne, make redy; make mery has both an Active and a Middle sense. We see put away (repudio), put forthe, put to geder. Many adjectives follow wax, as wax febyl, wax fatte, etc. The verb wynd-yn has six different meanings. There is the verb chenk, p. 75. There are several new verbs formed from nouns, as bowl, brain, church, gutt-on (exentero), *bacch-yn*¹ (back, retrofacere, p. 240), husbond-yn, moolde, netl-yn, pynn-in (intrudere), snare, howgh-in (hough), from the old hoh (poples). The old suken seems to have paved the way for a new verb sokyn (infundere), our soak. Some verbs have here more than one meaning; thus dwel-yn expresses the old manere, and the later habitare. The old varpa had meant projicere; it now means curvare, just as we use warp. The verb pyn-yn drops its old meaning cruciare, and expresses languere. The old nym (capere) was to seem to Palsgrave ninety years later to be "dawche (Dutch) and nowe none Englysshe;" still it is here set down, and also its derivative nom-yn, "a man taken with the palsy," our numb. Three different meanings are set down for lowr-yn. We see that arreptus might in 1440 be Englished by latchyd, fangyd, hynt, or cawzt; of these the last, the foreign word, is the only one that now keeps its ground in Standard English. There is the old adverb grovelynge or grovelynngys; but there is also a nominative case grovelynge, translated by supinus; so the word seems to have been mistaken for an Active Participle, coming from a supposed verb to grovel. We see schyllyn owte (shell out), and ly-yn yn referring to childbed; have beyng, p. 30; goo to and begin a deed (aggredior); syttyn at mete; most of them Biblical phrases. There are many words beginning with the privative on or un, such as onhurte (illæsus). The verb play governs an Accusative, being the game played, as pley-yn buk hyde. The old overlive had not yet made way for outlive; at least, we find ovrlevare (superstes). There is a curious new verb thowt-yn or saying thou to a man (tuo); this verb became common about 1600; there is another verb zeet-yn, or saying ye with worship. It will be remembered that the sharp distinction between thou and ye was drawn not far from Lynn in 1303, for the first time in England.

The new words akin to the Dutch and German are blore (blare), hoppe (humulus), loytr-on (loiter), moder, the East Anglian *mawther*¹ (puella), masel (serpedo); the Plural maseles (meazles) also occurs about this time; ² bumm-in,³ clam (clammy), foppe, luk (luck), dapir (elegans), molle (mole, replacing moldewarp), nagge, nodil, pikil, pippe (pituita), pläsche, rabet (cuniculus), stripe (vibex), top (turbo). Our frump, applied to an ugly woman, may come from the Dutch frommel (ruga), which is here written frumpil. The word daw is akin to a German word; we here see cadaw (monedula). The old German kil (calamus) has a u inserted, which produces quylle.

The Scandinavian words are bawlynge, p. 20, crus (our cruise, cantharus), chyrne (churn), cilte (glarea), to crasch, clamerin (clamber, meaning here reptare), flegge (acorus, our flag), fligge (fledge), gaunt, legge (ledge), nesin (sternutare), rumpe, roche (roach), scate (piscis), sqwyrtyl (sifons), step-in (infundere), bolke (bulk), burre (lappa), pegge, spudde, shrug, wikir, typ (pirula), pimbil; in this last a b has been inserted in the Icelandic þúmall. The Swedish flaga has given us our flaw; in this book we see the two forms whitflowe and whitlowe; this is still called whickflaw in some shires—that is, a flaw that hurts the nail to the quick. We see the source of Shakespere's "she had a tongue with a tang," a word still known in Yorkshire; the Icelandic tangi (aculeus) is seen here as tonge, which must not be confused with our word for forceps. One of the words for a beacon here is firbome; for this the Danes use baun; Palsgrave was to show us the word transposed as bonne-fyre.

There are the Celtic words bug (larva), bung, hassock, moppe, proppe, gagg-yn (suffocare), coker-in (fovere), and also whin from chwyn (weeds); the word here means ruscus, but we now restrict it to furze; there is the verb job (fodere).

Among the French words are but (meta), awburne, babulle (bauble), batylment, bokeram, byscute, caryare (vector), chine (spina), core, corn (of feet), cressaunt (lunula), dormouse,

boni (bunion), bunne (placenta), cedyr (cider), crani (cranny), cork, dram, entyrfer-yn, entre (ingressus), ferette, frise (frieze), flewe (flue), garbage, gyyste (joist), graceles, fouaile (fuel), goord (cucumber), glacynge, which is our grazing (devolatus), a grate, hale (halo), jurnalle, lint, manuele, marmeset, novys, parch, pentawncere (penitentiary), pere (pier of a bridge), petycote (worn by men at this time), platerre, promptare, pump, purcy (in wynd drawyng), queryster (chorister), quyver (pharetra), robows (rubbish), sawcyster (sausage), scanne, scren (screen), spawn, spavin, squerel, soket, sole (fish), spykenarde, stacyonere (bibliopola), sukyr candy, tankard, tann-in, terrere (canis), tysyk, tortuce (tortoise), trellis, trenchowre (a knife), vestrye. There is the musical mynyn (soon to become mynym). The union of Teutonic and French is seen in the following combinations: aftyр parte, forne parte, aneys seede, contremann (compatriota), dubbylman (falsus), feynt hertyd, fowre corneryd, fryyngge pann, pavyngge stone, fery place, hydyngge place, watryngge place, peynfullle (penalis). There are some Teutonic words that take ard for a suffix, such as dullard. There are the two forms canel and chanelle for canalis; these we now carefully distinguish. There is a curious attempt to Teutonise half of a French word; Manning's kaucé, the Scottish causey, reappears, but there is also the new form caucewei. We are reminded of the famous Norfolk partridges by the word cové (covey), here first found. There is tempyr (temperamentum), a sense the word had borne in France about the year 1400. There is not only the Old English line (funiculus), but also the French line (linea). There is a long Latin description of the Seven Agys; we find the Participle agyd and ag-yn (senescere). The adjective nice, which was always changing its meaning from 1300 to 1800, here takes the short-lived sense of iners; waitin bears its old meaning of observare, though in other parts of England it conveyed a different notion. The verbs cachyn and chasyn here still bear the same meaning, abigere, though the former, when employed as a Verbal Noun, may also mean apprehensio, its new sense in 1360. The verb payyn means solvere; in 1440 it can mean placare only when it is in the Past Participle. In 1397 doutful had meant terribilis; it now changes its sense to dubius. The word rewle here means, not only government, but the normal instruments of grammar, and the carpenter's tool. We see coller applied to hounds, to horses, to a man's garment, and to a livery badge. The word sqwyar is explained by gentylmann, and by the Latin words armiger, scutifer. We find sute meaning both prosecutio and sequela; we now use suit for the former, and suite for the latter. The word caucyon, following the old French usage, is explained as wedde (pledge); hence comes the caution money at Oxford. The communyone is used as a synonym for the Eucharist, I think, for the first time; a hundred years later, it was to drive out the old housel. As to clere, it may be applied to the weather (serenus); to water (limpidus); to man's wit (perspicax). We see batyldoure, but this means only an instrument for washing clothes. There is the term bace pleye, whence must come prisoner's base; this in Mirk had appeared as the game of bares. Chaucer's broudin now makes way for inbrowdyn, our embroider; a struggle seems to be going on between the French and Latin forms; we have endyte, entyrement (funerale), and envye, but also indyte, yntyrement, and invie; there are innevable, insur-yn, and many such. The in is certainly preferred to the en; but the on (the usual un) abounds; we see onmevable, onable (inhabilis), onrepentaunt, and the curious ontelleable among many others. The Latin abuti is translated by both dysuse and mysse-use; in our time, the foreigner has sadly encroached upon the home-born prefix. We have dressure or dressynge boorde, which we have turned into dresser. The word curfew had often appeared in our French legal documents, but never in an English book, I think, until we here see curfu. The Latin, as corrupted by the Northern French peasants, is now sometimes pushed aside by Latin brought straight from the fountain-head; we find both fassyone and factyone (forma), both olyfaunt and elefaunte. Chaucer's noun refute is now Latinised into refuge. Trevisa's enter in is expanded into entryn ynto a place; we have both returnyn and turnyn azene for reverti. The Latin rector is put down as equivalent to persone, curate; the sense of the latter was to change a hundred years later. There is muskytte, a small hawk, which, like the falconet, was to furnish a term for weapons of war. We have but two prepositions mentioned as attached to the Infinitive pass; one of these is pacyn over, whence came Tyndale's passover. The adverb coursly is formed from cours, p. 271; it here means "according to Nature," or "as a matter of course;" Bishop Pecock used the word a few years later. The Persian schach or shah (rex), coming through France, had before given rise to the word check, when the king in chess is threatened; we see in the 'Promptorium' both chekkyng (scactifico) and chekyn (suffoco).

Mr. Satchell published in 1883 a treatise on Fishing that seems to date from about 1440. The r is added to a word; the foreign mespilum, mesle, medletre, becomes our medeler (the tree), p. 8. We see heyghoge (hedgehog), blake thorne, schoyt (shoot of a tree), grelyng (grayling); also the technical rod, angler, lyne, floote (float), flye; the old mycelnes appears as mochenes (size), p. 30; whence our much of a muchness. There is the verb lond (land) applied to fish; and the new phrase ye may hap to take, p. 22; not the old it may hap you to, etc. There are the Celtic maggot, the Dutch blister, and the Scandinavian chobe (chub). Among the French words are signet (cygnet), vis (the tool), and the noun souce; a hawk is brought to the souce (sudden downfall), p. 3; hence the verb souse down on, of about 1570. This is the same word as sauce; the idea is, plunging something in pickle.

We may assign to 1440 or thereabouts the 'Lytell Geste of Robyn Hood'; it has some new words common to it and the 'Promptorium,' such as, swerdeman, buttes (metæ); there is also Audley's nje of his kynne.¹ The Monarch of the story is Edward, called elsewhere our kynge in the usual loyal style of English ballads; the poet would naturally throw his tale back seventy years or so, to the days of the hero of Cressy, who went about in disguise. The new phrase mery England is repeated here.

The 'Geste' is due to the North; the scene is laid near Doncaster; we see the words Yole, devilkins, win to it, mosse (palus), smart (acer), to-morne, tyll (ad), hame; the lodesman (dux) of Manning appears as ledesman. But the poem must have been transcribed in the South, long before it was printed about 1500; hence we find beth, y-founde; the a is sometimes altered into o, and there are mistakes, such as, se for fee (merces), myght for mote, hens for hethen or hennes, none for nane, well for wele, blyth for blive, as we see by the rimes. There is a Yorkshire phrase in p. 32, "God is holde a ryghtwys man" (being); something like this may still be heard at Almondsbury. The 'Geste' abounds in words that were soon to become obsolete in England, like derne, hende, wedde (mortgage), halfendele, me longeth; dereworth (pretiosus) is misunderstood as before. The transcriber knew nothing of the hine (famulus) of the North, so writes it hynde, though it rimed to dine; on the other hand, we have turned linde (tilia) into line or lime. There are old constructions like, the trewest woman that ever founde I me; Robyn bespake hym to the knight. We hear of a sorry housband—that is, a man who could not husband his resources well; the verb husband stands in the 'Promptorium.' A promise is made to the distressed knight that Lytyll Johan will stand him in a yeman's sted; hence our do yeoman's service. We find the old ballad phrases trystell tre, grene wood tre, Lyncolne grene. Among the Adjectives are fat-heded, to be long (in doing something), fyne ale browne. A knight complains (something like this appeared in 1360) that his friends will not know him when he has lost his goods: a very old instance of this phrase for cutting a man. We see stand used by robbers in their technical sense of the word when they stop travellers. There is have his answer, make a release. Among the Adverbs stand whither be ye away? as in Lancashire; wystly, the first hint of our wistfully. We see, among the Prepositions, wayte, up chaunce, ye mowe mete (upon the chance that); here up or upon is prefixed to a noun denoting something future; the old hereupon had referred to the past. The old but, at the beginning of a sentence, might still express nisi.

Among the French words are a pore present (humble gift), male hors (baggage horse), like our mail-cart. The old route is here used as a verb, to rout up the countre, as earlier in York.

The ballad of Robin Hood and the Potter seems to belong to the same time as the foregoing poem; the piece has been transcribed by an ignorant writer sixty years later, who writes ey for i, as dreyffe, mey: an early instance of this change, which led the way to our present pronunciation of drive and my. The poem must have been compiled in the North, perhaps not far from Wentbridge, which is named; we find herkens (audite), thow seys, deyell (diabolus), they schot abowthe, as in the 'Cursor Mundi;' here we should insert turn after the verb; a to-hande (two-handed) staffe, as in the 'Yorkshire Wills.' The copyist was puzzled by the old he cupe of corteysey, and writes the verb cowed; the Old English cocer (pharetra) is written quequer, a hoarier form than that in the 'Promptorium.' This copyist must have put in the Southern loketh (videte). There is the curious substitution of nor for than, which may still be heard; y had lever nar a hundred ponde that, etc. We see God eylde het the, where the second word has lost a y at the beginning.

In the 'Morte Arthure' (Early English Text Society), dating from about 1440, we find doffe of thy clothes; here there is the contraction of do off, and the of comes twice over.

In Gregory's Chronicle of this time we remark Chaucer's new word for courtiers, coming in p. 189, thoo aboute the kynge. We hear of the Prevy Seall (an official).

About this time we find a few new words akin to the German and Dutch, as sprotte (sprat), brick. There are the Scandinavian smatter (crepare), and chokeful (choke-full).¹

In the 'Plumpton Papers,' between 1440 and 1450, a few things may be remarked. The French joues is now written jawes, p. lxi., still keeping the old sound. There are the nouns karving knyves, p. xxxiv.; a sight (number) of people, the spring of the day, p. lix.; whence comes day-

spring; the new howbeit is written how it be. There is the verb roble (errare), p. lv.; it may be the parent of ramble. We see the phrase to faire foule with (fall foul of), p. lvi., lie in waite to, a future Biblical phrase. There is a literal translation of the French in a law deed; alway forseene, that if, etc., p. lxxxv.

In the 'Testamenta Eboracensia,' vol. ii. (1440-1450), the Maulde of former years now becomes Maude, p. 123. In ii. 106 we have in one sentence both the old verb and Wickliffe's new form; a bequest is made to a priest to myn my saule and minde me in his prayers. Among the new Substantives are spout and kyndenes, which may be done to a man, p. 119. A testator gives so much to every yoman in houshald, and half as much to every grome, p. 113; a distinction of ranks. We read of longe bowis, p. 113; men take administracion, in the same page. Among the French words is quarte potte. We hear of coral bedes and gete (jet) bedes; chaundeler refers in p. 112 not to a man, but to a light; we have since found the form chandelier convenient as a distinction. In p. 132 we read of silver with the touche of Paris; hence our touchstone. In a chapman's inventory, iii. 104, we see bonet used for a man's head-gear, while women's caps are mentioned later. In ii. 254 we come upon devyme service.

In the records of Coldingham Priory, vol. i. (1440-1450), we see King James II. using the Northern form convoy, not the Southern convey; the former was first seen in Barbour; our tongue is all the richer for these two forms. The Scotch turned the French parties into payrtiez, p. 120; a curious instance of dialectic peculiarity. We see the forms Home, Hume, Howme, all referring to one Scotch house; the dispute on this between the author of Douglas and the Essayist on Miracles is well known. Gilbert is cut down to Gib, p. 138; we know the French change of l into w; just so the Scotch used awssa for alswa, p. 140. There is a startling change in p. 160; the old cude (potuit) is written culde, from a false analogy with shulde and wulde. The n is dropped; Wyntoun's garnison becomes garyson, p. 149. In p. 133 stands the phrase chaunge it for the bettre; here some substantive is dropped after the last word. The noun unkouthness is used in p. 138 for estrangement; ground takes a new meaning, the causez and grounde (causa), p. 160. Among the verbs are gang throw wyth his maters, have in derision, lede a process upon; in Scotch law proofs are still led. In p. 119 stands I can noght say yha ne nay. The Southern "not long ago" appears in the North as nozȝ gan lang sen, p. 132, a hint of the future auld lang syne. The French and Latin words are surrendour, lawe canon et cywell (civil), a tak (lease), intimacion of it, this instant monthe of Aprill, a parcyale Juge, to purport, prædecessor; this last has unhappily driven out Piers Ploughman's forgoere. The Scotch writers had been fond of suppose; it now stands for if; suppoze he say it, p. 147. Our prefer (it was otherwise in France) may in our time bear the two senses of anteponere and promovere; they seem to be combined in prefer him before all men to the priory, p. 116. A man near death is said to have diseese, p. 121; the sense of incommodum is giving way to that of morbus. In p. 152 men have hasti expedicion.

In reading the 'Paston Letters' (1440-1448) our hearts are at once drawn to Margaret Mauteby, the lady who was married to John Paston in 1440; she uses old East Anglian forms, such as ghat, xal, dan (our than). Another Paston has the old noun breke for breach, p. 72. There is the form sord (gladius), p. 74, showing how w was dropped in the new pronunciation of the word. Among the Substantives we see the surname Dowebegyng, iii. 424, which was known all over the land in the days of the Crimean war. A Viscount is addressed as your Hygnes, p. 73. We see in an Inventory, iii. 418, the words fleshoke, pykforke (pitchfork). A new sense of dole, that still lingers in Norfolk, appears in p. 58; it here means a stone used to mark off divisions in land. In p. 60 stands our common the trowth is (that). Margaret Paston, in p. 69, describes a man as schyttyl wyttyd; perhaps our skittish may come from the same Swedish root skyttla (discurrere). Among the verbs we remark geve hym a lyfte, p. 71. A man, in p. 69, would have sold his goods, he had nowth rowth to qhom; we should now say, "he cared not to whom;" a new use of the Relative. We see (out) of the Kynys gode grase (favour), p. 68. The head of the family is dutifully addressed by his younger brother as Syr, and Margaret writes to her ryth wyrchypful hwsbond; our post cards now give little space for titles of honour. There is a French letter in p. 64 which shows the source of many of our English phrases; we there read pour cause que, non obstant, faire difficultey, la dicte isle, en tempz advenir; there are the Latinised forms of 1370, like escript and soubz. We may particularly remark le non aage de, etc.; in p. 50 we find non first prefixed to a Teutonic word, your noun comyng hedir, a phrase written by a man learned in the law. We have buffet (a piece of furniture); in the same page, iii. 420, stands lignum in le carthows, a curious mixture of Latin, French, and English, in one item of an Inventory. We see the French participle enterlessant (interlacing), p. 65; this ending in ant must have reminded the East Anglians of their old Participial ending in and, which was not yet gone.

In the years 1447 and 1448 a long lawsuit was dragging on between the Mayor and the Bishop of Exeter. The former, John Shillingford by name, has left us a most interesting series of letters to his townfolk, describing the progress of the suit; these have lately been printed for the Camden Society. We know that business from all parts of the country came before the London lawyers; and these, riding their circuits, must have appeared in the shires as missionaries of the best style of English. Thus, in the present instance, we see how the New Standard, spoken at London for the last three generations, was making its influence tell on the far West, the country which, as Giraldus Cambrensis says, had most perfectly kept King Alfred's forms of speech. In these 'Letters' are found the Northern forms their, tham, that, nor, not, same, byseke; while the native ham, tho, and thike, p. 23 (usually thilke), also appear. There are, moreover, the Southern o (unus), bulls (bills), puple, we both, it was ydo; the Southern prefix is kept even before a foreign participle, like y-reported; this was to last only thirty years longer, at least in writing, as a general rule. The old thearf remains in I ther say, p. 35. The tyme of servyce doynge preserves a very old English idiom, for here the Accusative is placed before the Verbal Noun. The English sound of chif is already found, when Chif Justice Fortescu is mentioned.

We get a hint as to the old sound of early in some Southern shires, when we find yerly in p. 16; yeve stands for give. The y is inserted in a word, as on the Severn; yncomyers stands in p. 112. The w is prefixed, as in Salop; we find wother (other), p. 117. The t is added in parchemente. Among Nouns we remark the curious phrase my lorde is (lord's) gode lordship, p. 15; where Lord Chancellor Kempe is referred to. Certain proofs are committed to the wysedomys of the Judges. In p. 49 a thing is done with hardnys (difficulty); in the next page hardly stands for laboriously. The Mayor talks of "our comynge haste to London," p. 54; here the in that should have come before haste is dropped; our post haste is well known; something like this had appeared in 1230. Wickliffe had already written bac half; here in p. 86 we hear of the bak side of a building. Free comynge and going stands in p. 100, where we have to use entrance and exit.

Among the Adjectives the old form lowlokest (lowliest) is preserved in p. 132. In p. 7 the Mayor enters the Chancellor's ynner chamber, a form peculiar to the South. In p. 38 raw stands for novus; we now often couple it with soldiers. We hear of dredefull and mysgoverned puple in p. 112, a new sense of the adjective; hence comes our "dreadful rogue." In p. 109 something is proved gode and true.

As to the Pronouns, we see that the Chancellor Archbishop, the first subject in the realm, uses the polite ye when addressing the Mayor, p. 6. The use of the Northern yours has reached Exeter; in p. 17 stands money of youris. In p. 56 comes they and alle theyris. The his is often employed as the sign of the Genitive, as my lord of Excetre is tenantis, p. 44. Another Northern usage is whas names (quorum nomina), p. 118. The morun, p. 18, is used in the South much as in Scotland now, where they say "how are you the day?" seeing no need to use on befor a Dative case. There is a strange arrangement of the Numeral in p. 115 : Kyng Harey is tyme the Thirddde ; in p. 120 stands the ijde Kyng Harry is tyme.

As to the new idioms of Verbs, what was the Dative Absolute is now turned into the Nominative, even in the South, he menyng (this), p. 13 ; in p. 30 he to fele seems to stand for he being to fele. In p. 92 there is a startling change of idiom which did not become common until 300 years later ; being is prefixed to a Past Participle ; wyn is being y put to sale ; this idiom is repeated in p. 100. We know the disputes that have arisen about the confusion of the Infinitive and the Verbal Noun ; in p. 32 the Infinitive mistrusten is altered by the Mayor into mystrustyng. There are new phrases like put in answers, p. 2 ; abyde (stand) apoun their right, p. 21 ; make myche of this matter, p. 30 ;¹ do gode (be of use), give over (cease), p. 46. There is the first hint of hounds throwing off in p. 36, where the phrase seems to stand for breaking loose.

In p. 7 to morun stand for cras. There is we were thurgh (finished), p. 37 ; here the preposition becomes an Adverb.

As to Prepositions, there is Pecoek's habit of coupling them before the case governed, as by and to suche, p. 106 ; yn and of the cite, p. 110. We find apon my sawle in p. 16. The Yorkshire unto (p. 63) is now known in the South. What we call in their turn was known of old as for their torne, p. 138.

There is the puzzling Interjection Alagge (alack) uttered twice by the Lord Chancellor Archbishop in p. 18 ; it was thus most honourably introduced into English speech. The new French phrases are demene us, it is his part to, a rule (given by the Chancellor), etc., to travers him. In p. 37 the Chancellor stands yn his astate near the fire ; that is, in the robes of his dignity. In p. 56 comes to all ententis. There are words like symytery (cemetery), robill (rubble, rubbish), p. 89 ; nude, p. 132 ; to noyse, surmyse, yong peple, misrule, retaille, noysaunce (nuisance), precyncte, trial, compre- mys, to notice. Entrety and trete both stand for the same thing, tractatus; it is the same with the verbs entrete and trete. We hear of my Mayster Radford (a renowned lawyer) and my Maistresse his wyf, p. 61. The mayster is cut down to our common form Mr. before a surname in p. 89. The verb commaund in p. 61 expresses our commend; the latter appears in p. 15; comander in Old French expressed both jubeo and commendo; we have found it convenient to separate the two meanings. There is a compounding of Teutonic and French in the words comyscyoner, p. 139, coronershipp. A French Participle appears, written both joynaunt and junant, in p. 86; joyning is also found. In the next page our abutting is seen with the first letter clipped. Alliteration affects French as well as English words; in p. 88 things are kept saf and sure. The French ending acion is tacked on to a Teutonic root in p. 95, where we read of the stallacion of Bishop Leofrik. We constantly hear of the mynysters of the Church, and of the close where they dwelt. An action may be reall, personall, or myxte, p. 139. We see both the old auctoritee and the new authoritee, p. 139; in the same page charters may be cancelyd. We hear of the justices of peas now beynge or (in) tyme to comynge; in the last word the confusion between the Infinitive and Verbal Noun reappears. In p. 88 suspicious bears its Passive, not its Active, sense. In p. 19 we hear of a greet barre (number of lawyers). We find the Under Tresorer mentioned in p. 7; a translation of the French sous; in our day we talk of a sub-way. The English thrall has the French preposition en prefixed in p. 98. The very (valdè) has not yet reached Exeter from the North East.

About this time we meet with the adverb on abreast (abreast) and the verb abreathe horses; the latter was to lose its first syllable in the next Century. See Dr. Murray's Dictionary.

In 1449 Pecock, Bishop of Chichester, brought out his work, the 'Repressor of overmuch blaming the Clergy' (Master of the Rolls), written against the Lollards. Pecock was the greatest English prose writer that flourished in this Century ; he was fully conscious of his talents ; for none of our standard writers have ever betrayed so much self-conceit. He is said to have written books in English for twenty years together. He much insists upon "the doom of natural resoun," which is clepid moral lawe of kinde. He is a forerunner of Hooker, not only in his matter, but in his style ; Pecoock forestalls the writers of 1600 in his long sentences (some of seventy words), and in his use of the parenthesis ; see p. 86.

He is fond of Latin words, and often employs Latin constructions, such as the Accusative coupled with the Infinitive ; he has all Orrmin's love of the Passive Voice, as weren to be blamed, p. 227. He frequently repeats a foreign construction, such as, with other therto bi reson dewe circumstauncis, p. 1 ; her propre to hem boundis, p. 32 ; preching has his dew wiseli to be don exercise, p. 90 ; something altogether new in English. He likes to couple Teutonic and Romance words, as leeve and licence, donatouris or zeveris, p. 412. He is fond of Manning's wolde God, and often has the Northern corruption seen in thou tookist. He has the Northern phrases to make azens it and the utterist degree. He sticks to the Southern hem, thilke, and clepe, and the Plural of the Present Tense, forms which were now going out. He gives us a well-known proverb anent familiarity ; overmyche homeliness with a thing gendriith dispising, p. 184. Pecoock illustrates our English fondness for ew by turning the Latin subducere into subdewe. We see lousid (solutus), p. 517, just as we pronounce the word. He inserts the o, and so talks of a thoruz faar (thorough fare), p. 521.

He has ways of his own in forming the endings of Substantives ; thus he adds er to old words in his first page, and gives us the overer, the netherer ; he uses a French ending when writing overté (superiority), p. 299 ; also gold-smythi (the trade), p. 50. He is the first, I think, to employ badnes, p. 105. He is fond of ing in the Plural, writing holdingis (tenets), makingis ; he gives us our common word feelingis, p. 87, using it for sententie ; also suffringis, failingis. We see the Plural almessis, p. 550. It was a custom about this time to set un before old words very freely; Pecock has the unhavyng of this, p. 89; many unhelpis (lets), p. 108. He employs Plural nouns in new senses, as natural helpis; he makes a substantive of an adverb, in othere wheris (places), p. 27. He has phrases like it is in being, p. 12; mis undirstonding; a rateler out of textis, p. 88; modir tunge; his dai labour; the lotting (allotting) of cuntrees, p. 198; a brigge at his laste cast, p. 338; here we now make gasp the word at the end. He coins a new substantive in "Goddis forbode be it but that," etc.; this he often uses, dropping the be; see p. 537. He uses schaft, p. 28, for the stem of a tree; hence we employ it for columna. He calls the Lollards oure Bible men, and doctour mongers; the last part of the compound was creeping into more extended use; the heretics called themselves knowun men, p. 53. He has ize sizt, leevis (in a book). He has both clock and orologe in the same page, 118; but avoids Lydgate's word dial, though describing the thing. He tells us that the part is sometimes used for the whole, giving as an illustration the Old English habit of employing the word winters for years, p. 151. Another old sense of a word is seen in "foulis and their briddis" (pulli). The Southern Genitive Plural appears once more in Iewen preestis (Iudæorum). We see in p. 371 "whether he be knyzt, squyer, gentilman;" here a distinction seems to be made between the two last words.

Among the Adjectives we see naught turned into an adjective, p. 430; nauzt and badde; we now add a y to it. In p. 552 stands lordli. Pecock is fond of the foreign able as an ending for adjectives; he has unberable, seable, smelleable, doable, and many such; this we first saw in Hampole and Wickliffe. He sometimes tries the foreign ose or ous; craftsmen appear as craftiose men, p. 450; there is also costiose.

As to Pronouns, whiche stands for the kindred qualis almost for the last time, p. 313, as well as for qui, quod; it is often used here as the Neuter Relative. In p. 99 comes the curious whatever (thing) whiche. In p. 171 we have what is it to us that, etc. In p. 492 comes deedis whos forbering is, etc. (refraining from which), a rare idiom. Instead of whose, in p. 215 is found the iugement of whom ever hath seen. Pecoock likes to couple two or three synonyms; thus he has oonli or aloone, p. 12. There is ech such man, p. 243; eny oon person, p. 384; also the new repetitive idiom twixe persoon and persoon, rewme and rewme, p. 450; eny man, preest or no preest, p. 295. He is always bringing in two words of his own coining, evereither and neverneither. He Englishes multum thus, bi a greet deel; we now drop the bi. Instead of our "so much for that," he has the short sharp sentence, thus miche there, p. 197.

Among the Verbs we remark would beginning to encroach upon should (oportet); as if so, it wolde folewe that, etc., p. 24; thouz a man wolde denye, p. 186; still in Pecoock should sometimes keeps its old place. In p. 95 stands thouz God schulde not and wolde not suffre; we have now all but dropped the should, except as a synonym for debere, though we still say, "it should seem that." The shall, as in Manning, is used for soleo; thei han mouth and thei schulen not speke, p. 153. In p. 112 we hear of a sermon to be prechid; the about, which we should insert after the noun, had not yet appeared in this sense. Two Infinitives Passive are strangely bracketed in, what ouzte be askid to be doon, p. 517. In p. 351 stands bileeve (it) to be trewe. There are phrases like born into liif, renne thoruz (a book), make an assaut, make proof of, make a zifte, make no difference, make answer, prechingis rennen arere (into arrear), p. 90, do sewtis and servicis, lock it up, han no place in matters of faith, have part and lott in, have access, a weel tried revelacioun, bear office, alle thingis considerid, hold residence, turn jewelis into money. Pecoock coins a verb in ooned (united) to God, p. 41; also to unworship God, p. 64; later writers made this disworship; to strengthe it, p. 67, to be bodied (embodied), p. 245. A curious Latin idiom is, it is walkid arizt, p. 75. The revenues are said to schrink (become less), p. 347; in p. 374 a leg is said to loll (dangle) from a stirrup; Piers Ploughman had long before spoken of lazy devotees as lollers. In p. 548 we hear of the blasing colour of dress; something like our loud patterns. In p.

563 Lollards, speaking of the Eucharist, myscall it bi foule names; the first hint of our calling names. In p. 102 stands ther came into my knowing, that (came to my knowledge); in p. 246 ydolatrie came up. In p. 377 stands he mai avorthi (afford) to have; here the old iforpien loses the sense of perficere, and the idea of command of money comes in.

Among the Adverbs we see men comen rathir (sooner) or latir, p. 94; of the newe (anew). In p. 19 stands men musten needis graunte; we can now never use this old adverb (nearly all its old strength is gone) except after must; in p. 192 Pecoock coins nedisli. There is a change of meaning in "to speke wiildeli," p. 72, referring to hyperbole; we have piththeli. The that is dropped in y am sikir (that) thei wolden, p. 71. In p. 370 we have esilier, and in p. 268 the corrupt esier, which is here a comparative adverb; in p. 159 comes knele louzer (lower). In p. 267 stands whanne and whilis he is present; the coupling of these is something new. Pecoock is fond of imitating the Latin quin; not so myche lasse but that, etc., p. 344; y can not see but that, etc., p. 433. In p. 350 stands so or so or so it is writun, which is unusual. The notwithstanding is employed for quamvis, p. 355, and for tamen, p. 402, no that following in either instance. The as is still further developed, for it stands before Passive as well as Active Participles; take it as for doon (done), to which Pecoock adds the explanation, or as thouz it had be doon, p. 394.

Turning to Prepositions, he is fond of anentis; he has gift under trust, in large lengthe (at great length), p. 563. He often prefixes up to verbs. He objects to fore as a prefix, for he has the before goyng conclusioun, p. 167; he is guilty of the strange blunder, to biforbar (prohibere) a thing, p. 477, where the verb is the French bar, and where the intensive for should be prefixed, as in the verb forpamper. Pecoock is fond of setting over (nimis) before Romance adjectives, as over contagiose, in p. 345; according to a favourite idiom of his he has over and above it; but he couples more than two prepositions in his out, fro, and bi an occasioun, p. 327. He employs toward in a new sense; toward the eende (of a book), p. 303. In p. 458 he has of liik state with, a new idiom, where the preposition supplants as. We see obieciouns biholding the bible, p. 85 ; this is the first hint of our regarding used as a Preposition.

Among his Romance words we see lay men, waastful, pointis of lawe, vituperacioun, neutralis, unsavory (sermon), necessarili, habituali, alloweabili, usuali, abhorre, to cumpeny with, a concordance (for the Bible), a reverent persoon (man), rehercel, assignees. We see how many long foreign adverbs Pecock brought in. He has to dress words to (address), p. 2 ; streyn a text, p. 58. We see the substantive choice (purpose), p. 42. The Latin form is often preferred to the French ; we see the conversis (converts), p. 59 ; cartis or chartouris are coupled in p. 402. We find graceful in the sense of gratus, p. 66 ; curiose in p. 245 is something strange that cannot be understood, reminding us once more of quaint. In p. 68 attend to is used in the French sense (expectare) ; in p. 85 it is used in our present sense of the word (operam dare). In p. 135 we find waite to be hoosilid ; here the first verb, bearing the sense of morari, governs an Infinite Passive. In p. 74 we read of sensitif wit (referring to the five senses) ; in p. 519 we see in one sentence, inward sensityve wyttis and outward sensityve wyttis. In p. 88 detect means to inform against ; the verb in this sense comes often in Lollard trials seventy years after this time. In p. 103 we see improve with the meaning redarguere ; and in p. 120 comendyng gets the new sense of laus. The adjective symple means stultus in p. 157 ; it means honestus in p. 272. In p. 183 something is doon in the better forme (way) ; the last noun has in our day come into great vogue. In p. 450 we read of badde maners (conduct) ; in p. 519 maner means custom. Pecock gives, in p. 484, the two meanings borne in his time by the word religioun, touching on the well-known passage in St. James. He clings to the old way of forming the comparative of Adjectives, even if they be Romance, for he has evycenter and perfiter ; there are also vertuosenes, quietnes, contrariose, prestial (priestly), religiosite. He prefixes un to Romance words, as unfruytful, unusid, p. 431. For vinea he has both vyner, p. 389, and vyne gardein, p. 383. He makes opinioun and Church masculine, calling them he, pp. 96 and 334. Pecoock continues our old verb stie, but brings in ascend, the stranger that was to supplant it. He has a favourite phrase of ours, manye zeeris in successioun, p. 306. In p. 477 stands expropriat poverté, that is, a state of life that forbids holding property.

The famous ballad of 'Chevy Chase' may date from about 1450. Here we find the Northern Jamy; also driver and spearman. The word like is used in a new sense (ut decet); Douglas marshals his host, lyk a cheffe cheften of pryde. We see meet him on man for on (man to man). The half stands before a Passive Participle, as half done.

The Stasyons of Jerusalem (Horstmann, 'Altenglische Legenden') may belong to 1450. We hear of Candy (Crete), p. 356, and we find the word quaryntyne in p. 365; it here means the place where Christ fasted forty days. We read of the coveré of conies, p. 361, a new form; it was usually covert. The traveller is struck by the fact that the Latin clergy at Jerusalem wore long beards; they were barefooted friars, p. 359.

In the same volume, p. cxxi., may be found the word herthstede, whence comes our fire place, in a document of this age.

There are some poems in 'Religious and Love Poems' (Early English Text Society), pp. 52, 95, 215, which seem to belong to 1450. The Southern Imperative, ending in eth, comes often; on the other hand, there is the Northern in no kyns wise. We see weel at hir ease, where the pronoun is something new. There are the new phrases better saide thanne doon, I betake me to, etc. In p. 217 we hear of a soukyng sore; this shows us the source of Tyndale's soaking consumption. Among the Romance words we find obstynate. We see the form defyled, p. 104; like the previous undefiled.

There are many pieces, dating from about 1450, scattered through the 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ.' In i. 91 stands a curious mixture of English and Latin in hexameters, beginning with an invective against fleas, flies, and friars—

“Fratres Carmeli navigant in a bothe (boat) apud Eli, Omnes drencherunt, quia sterisman non habuerunt.”

Something not unlike these lines has come down to the schoolboys of our own day.

In i. 324 stands

“Is gote eate yvy.
Mare eate ootys.”

I well remember, about 1850, hearing in Devonshire the line, rapidly pronounced, as a puzzle—

“Can a mare eat hay? can a goat eat ivy?”

A favourite usage of schoolboys dates from 1450 or so; we see in ii. 163—

“He that stelys this booke
Shul be hanged on a hooke.

Whane yee this boke have over-redde and seyne,
To Johan Shirley restore yee it ageine.”

There are several other couplets of this kind given here. The phrase “not at home” was used to troublesome visitors in 1450; see i. 271. In i. 2 is a poem on the miseries of the sea. There is the sailor’s cry, y how (yoho); we hear of the bote swayne and the steward, who is ordered to bring a pot of bere; this beverage had hitherto been hardly mentioned at all. The passengers also partake of a saltyd tost, the first appearance of this last word as a noun. The word mate is used, like fellow on land. The command is given, vere the shete; the verb is French; the shete for the first time stands for velum.

In the Treatise on hawking the former Tomme is now cut down to Tom, i. 84. We see the new Substantives dovecote, quicsand, nightcap, grub. In i. 25 comes I am your man, addressed to a lady; this noun we usually address to a comrade. We hear of the ruff (roof) of the mouth, i. 300. There is the Shakesperian eyas, used of a hawk, i. 294.

Among the Adjectives we find lyght of love, i. 28; a woman is called chiri ripe (ripe as a cherry), i. 248.

Among the Verbs are flusch (put up game), bubble. There is gagul, used of the noise made by a goose; hence Bishop Montague's book, nearly two Centuries later, called 'A Gag for a Goose.' There are the phrases have lovers in hand, drive the dust in his eye, keep (maintain) a wife, to hold abacke, set foot there, take payne. The proper technical words for hawking are given in i. 293; a hawk eyrs (the French aire means nidus), but does not breed; hence came eyrie; so in p. 296 a hawk nims its prey, but does not take it; a covey is merked (marked), p. 297. When we say, "I cannot help it," help means prevent; we see the source of this in p. 301; that the hawke schal not dye thus a man may help hit. The two forms lorn and lost occur in one line, i. 50.

As to the Prepositions, in i. 261 stands nowe for the fourth poynthe; this for had hitherto been to.

There is the Scandinavian flounder, the fish.

Among the French words are salpetre, sausage, trinket, vitriol, radish, decrease, money maker. The word galant had been so long in use that it gives birth to galantnesse, i. 75 (bravery of apparel); gallant and brave later underwent the same change of meaning. In i. 77 nyse loses its old meaning of stultus, and bears the exactly opposite sense of discriminating judgment; a meaning it may still bear. In i. 303 we have both the old triacle and the new treacle; it here loses the sense of remedium and gains its present meaning. We learn in i. 296 to speak of a covey of partridges, and of a bevy of quails. In i. 28 is the common rewlyd by me. In the next page, Stafford blewe seems to have been as famous as Lincoln green.

The Book of the Knight of La Tour-Landry (Early English Text Society) was compiled in French in 1372, and was translated into English about fourscore years later. It may be due to Salop; we see the forms seing that, melke, kesse, fere (ignis); there are the Northern nor, are, sen (quoniam), eggis (ova), manered, as in 'Piers Ploughman,' and leude (libidinosus, p. 23), Myrc's sense. There are many Southern forms, such as suster, beth, thilke, ydo, she nis not, moche; we find in one sentence the two old forms of the Imperative, knouithe you and heres therof, p. 83; there are both thair and her (illorum); the Southern her follows a Northern idiom and becomes heres (theirs), p. 53. The English word for subula had been pronounced in Southern England like the French oul or ioul; but in p. 67 it is written all, just as we pronounce it, following the unusual sound of Wickliffe's ál. There is the very old form beriels (sepulchrum); other parts of England had clipped the last letter; there is also sithe (time), and the form wonder devout, p. 8; this way of expressing the Superlative had been peculiar to the Severn country for 250 years; there are, moreover, the Severn transpositions nwe (novus) and renue; the old pitous has the usual Severn insertion piteous, p. 136. The r is added, for the old splent becomes splinter, p. 9.

Among the Substantives we see the form is used to form the Genitive, both for female and Plural nouns; mention is made of daughters, and then comes atte the eldest ys hous, p. 9. We see bayte used in connexion with fishing, p. 59. The modern use of our gossip is fully explained in p. 96, where one godsib passes on to another a wondrous tale, "till all the contre spake therof." We hear of a cutting of vynes, p. 8, used to form a bed; hence a well-known term in gardening.

Among the Adjectives we see brayne sik, p. 20; hote langage, p. 19. As in the 'Promptorium' the word fresh, applied to dress, is used as a synonym for gay all through the book; so fresh and fair have been coupled ever since. The adjective mannisshe is applied to "a woman that is not humble and pitous," p. 136; this ish has often since been used to express an evil shade of meaning, like bearish, loutish.

The Nominative of the Pronoun replaces the rightful Dative in she hadd ben beter to have been stille, p. 32; the old out of his wit becomes oute of hym self (beside himself), p. 6. In p. 81 we see the phrase she had not (nought) to do there, "no business there." There is a long expression for nemo in p. 69; no maner of man.

Among the verbs we see misanswer, put in the way of, bear record, axe (in marriage), how fele ye youre self?

When we see grapped, p. 139, the Perfect of grip, there is a kind of compromise between the Strong and Weak form. There is the curious idiom (she) lost the king to be her husband, p. 19. One Severn idiom of this work, he made as they (though), p. 77, has been brought into our Bible by Tyndale. In p. 126 stands ne hadde it be that, etc. ("had it not been that"), a common idiom in our days. The former bihabben now appears as behave herself, p. 127; there is the noun behaving, soon to be supplanted by another form of the word. In our day a person "has the last word," the source of this is in p. 28; she let him have the wordes (all the talk). In former times men let crie festis; in p. 110 the first verb is altered into made, following French usage. In p. 11 men wynde up water at a well; this expression was later transferred to watches and mercantile affairs.

Among the Adverbs we find derkeling, p. 21, where the old ling is applied to an Adjective, just as sideling and hedlinge (headlong) had been already struck off. A woman is not to answer her husband overthwartly (crossly, p. 28); but across was now beginning to supplant the older athwart. We have right so in p. 143, where we now say just so. In p. 52 stands or ever were saide masse; this curious or ever came into the Bible later; it is like where ever are you coming?

As to the Prepositions, we see marry him into (a family), p. 18. The idiom at the least is carried a little further; in p. 81 stands atte the hardest (our at the worst). We saw in Salop, about 1220, have a dear bargain on (in) me; we now find, in p. 33, we are deceived in you. In p. 166 comes not so faire bi the seventh part as, etc., we should say, "not a seventh part so fair." A French idiom, first adopted in the 'Percival,' 150 years earlier, is continued; here is a faire body of a woman, p. 38; like our "he is a fine figure of a man."

There is one Scandinavian verb, it boted not (availed not), p. 66; here no Accusative follows, as 130 years before.

This work, as might have been expected, abounds in French phrases; the writer often does not trouble himself to translate, writing Sampson the fort, parent (kinsman), couroux, verres (glasses), schorche (flay); the old form roialme is found. There are, besides, the verbs goormaunde, puissant, famiss, resuscit, to gage bataile, disarm, to be storied (rehearsed), to endoctrine orphelyns, usance (mos), incontenent (statim), custumer (solitus). In p. 130 stands a plumme tre pruner; here we have the French added to the very old English synonym. In p. 148 the Virgin calls herself the chaumbrere (ancilla) of God; but the word has a bad meaning in p. 30, where evil women in France make themselves chambres to Englishmen; hence comes the "chambering and wantonness" of our Bible. In p. 128 a Queen is attended by her gentille woman. In p. 149 the Virgin shows courtesy and good nature on her visit to Elizabeth; the latter phrase was not to reappear till long afterwards. In p. 146 there may be recovery (regaining) of time, as well as of sickness. In p. 137 men ought to be in charite togedre; in the next page charitable is opposed to unforgiving. In p. 28 we hear of evelle langage (bad language). In p. 84 symple, coupled with debonaire, expresses our easy-going; there is a shade of difference between this and humble, one of the old senses of simple. In p. 154 a lady is required (sought) in marriage; hence our "be in great request;" the verb, like desire, will express either rogare or jubere. In p. 106 we hear of the faon (fawn) of a lion. There is the portentous compound disworship.¹ In p. 90 a wicked woman is paied; we should say paid out. In p. 110 we read of excessive vayne glorie; this paved the way for Tyndale's use of exceeding (valdè) instead of the old passing. Samson, in p. 93, is led to the maister pillour of the hall; Macaulay's word master-piece is in our time encroached upon by the penny-a-liner's chef d'œuvre.

The 'Book of Curtesye' (Early English Text Society), composed by an old pupil of Lydgate's, may date from about 1450; it abounds with Imperatives in eth, soon to vanish altogether. The interchange between u and v is plainly seen in demevire (demure), p. 10. The later French sound of ch is introduced in schirche (church), p. 10. The word fulsumnesse keeps its old meaning of copia in p. 40; but in p. 26 fulsom means satur. There is apish, p. 48. A flogging is called a berchely fest, p. 30; the first hint of the English tree of knowledge. We read of blounte langage, p. 46. An Adjective is intensified by prefixing a substantive; in p. 6 we hear that nails ought not to be geet (jet) blake. The pronoun he stands for one in p. 6; this childe is he that is well taught. Among the Verbs are fecch a compace, pley Jakke malapert (Tomfool), ye have you (behave you), p. 16. The Romance words are pertinent, advertyse, to brace, cyrcumspectly, reprocheable; attendaunce stands for our attention, p. 12. We now talk of "quality and quantity;" in p. 14 we read, lette maner and mesure be youre guydes twey. There is interrupte, one of the forms derived from the Latin Participle, not from the French Infinitive.

The trainer of youth who wrote the 'Book of Curtesye' directs their attention to the old English poets; Chaucer has seldom been awarded higher praise than in p. 34; he turned our ears into eyes; his language seemed to his countrymen

"'Not only the worde, but verrely the thing.'"

The 'Chester Mysteries' (edited by Mr. Wright for the Shakespere Society) may have been compiled about 1450; they have come down to us in a transcript made 140 years later. We see, by the rimes, what the original must have been in the following instances:—

Original.	Transcript.
In fere (simul)	In freye, i. 126.
Repreved	Reproved.
Breres	Breyers.
Barne (puer)	Baron.
Fere (procul)	Farre.
Has	Hath.
Dalte	Dealed.
Segh (vidi)	Seinge, ii. 77.

In p. 174 we see swaine written for the old swoun (our swoon); a curious instance of the double sound of oy, which must have led to the mistake. There are very old words like beames (tubæ) and thester (tenebræ), which seem to have died out of the South by this time; there is the Scandinavian hethen (hinc). On the other hand, we see Southern forms, as i-mente, oo (unus), and sometimes seith (quoniam). Much Latin is used for the stage directions; some of these Latin words seem to have been Englished much later; in i. 57 stands havinge restored, a new idiom which cannot well have been set down in writing before 1520. We also see common wele altered into common welth, ii. 82. The seinge that (quoniam), which so often appears, carries us back to the 'Lollard Apology' in 1400. Cheshire is not far from Piers Ploughman's country; we see his word pevishe; his daffe (stultus) and ratoun now become dafte and rotten. The old nagere (our auger) is still preserved, i. 107.

Among the new Substantives are boe-sprite, whippecord. Cain speaks of my dadde and mam; afterwards comes mame and dadd; these forms are spread over many lands. In i. 52 gossip bears the meaning of the Latin comes, losing its religious sense. The audience is addressed, i. 91, as Lordes and Ladyes that bene presente (our "ladies and gentlemen"). The old deal (pars) is now replaced by bit; my bodye burnes everye bitte, ii. 184. The form gamon is written for game all through. In i. 175 stands the phrase at your becke.

Among the Adjectives is elvishe. In i. 229 stands the new phrase thy owine (own) dere.

We find, i. 184, have thou one (a blow); here one has no antecedent; we still say, "that's one for his nob." In i. 215 stands it is the vereye same; here very retains a trace of ipse, as we saw in Chaucer's writings.

As to the Verbs, we may remark the curious mixture of Southern and Midland forms in the Plurals; beasts that creepeth, flyne, or gone, i. 22. In i. 55 you mon (must) knowe stands by itself; the phrase is now common. There are take a turne with (have a bout with); flye out of his skynne, i. 151; brew thin, ii. 82; loke up (search out) a book (found in the 'Paston Letters' about this time); slea them downe, like the burn down of the year 1300.

We have seen to my knowledge; we now have to my deemynge, to your likynge.

As to Interjections, Marye is an oath used by Noah, i. 54. There is a stage direction, i. 136, singe trolly loly, something like tra la la. In i. 218 stands the curse, a vengeance on them; this prefixing the article is curious. We see in ii. 57 the Shakesperian anon, Maister, anon! equal to our "coming, Sir."

The Scandinavian words are filly (equa) and the verb tipple. In ii. 142 we read of skewed horses, the first hint of our skewball; this seems to come from the Danish skiev (obliquus), irregularly marked.

Among the French words we see baronete coupled with barrones and burgess. There is the phrase wage warre, i. 173, where the verb takes a new meaning; also to caulk a ship. We often see Chaucer's I coungȝr thee in the sense of obsecro. The Devil is spoken of as Ruffyne, i. 17, which perhaps led to our ruffian.

In the York wills, ranging between 1451 and 1458, we remark in p. 175 that a yoman in the house is sharply distinguished from a grome and a hyen (hind); we read of lytill Nanne, a curious instance of n being prefixed. We see the verb will (in the sense of bequeath), ii. 149; in p. 192 stands the old to overlife me; the over in compounds, when referring to time, was thirty years later to be replaced by out. There is the term resedenter (resident), used by Lord Scrope, p. 191; this still lingers in Scotland. In p. 176 we hear of the jornenall (journal), which Constable, a Yorkshire squire, bore always in his sleeve; these two pages are full of Northern forms.

In the 'Paston Letters,' between 1448 and 1460, we mark the lingering traces of the Norfolk dialect, soon to vanish from the correspondence of the educated. Sir John Fastolf (the Shakesperian hero) talks in his will of Mikel Yermuth, and has gove (datum), farthyst (not the proper furthest); he also uses the Northern Imperative "sendis me word," p. 94; having lived long in France, he writes moyen for mean, p. 309, and ayle (avus), p. 362. Agnes Paston, one of the old school, born about 1400, often writes the Infinitive in en, and uses the rewli (rueful) of the Genesis and Exodus poem, p. 219. William Paston has a (he) toke me, p. 302, much in the style of Robert of Brunne; and a Lincolnshire knight talks of women mylkanð kine, p. 98. On the other hand, we hear of "pillows of a lasser assyse" (size), p. 478. The word assuage appears as squage, p. 160, like the East Anglian squilk (talis) of the year 1280. The forms syns and nor appear in Norfolk use in the year 1450; see p. 179; the old chapitle has not been quite ousted by chapter, p. 395. The Duke of York employs the Northern form childre (liberi), while the Duke of Suffolk has the Southern axe (rogare). One of the most amusing things in the 'Letters' is Friar Brackley's dog Latin, which is sometimes worthy of Molière's quacks. See i. 524.

As to the Vowels, a replaces e; we see harbyger, an official sent on before his Lord, p. 525; initial a is clipped, for we see larum. The city of Debylyn has not yet become Dublin, p. 505. The y is prefixed in yelfate, p. 490; the Scotch still say yill for ale. The a becomes i in Yimmis (James), p. 514; whence our Jim. Warwick writes goud for the old gode (bonus), p. 95; and the proper name Shuldram stands in p. 191, one of the few words in which we still keep the true old sound of u. We see in these letters both the old Bewcham and the new Bemond. The Duke of York turns the rihtwus of 1303 into rightuous (Introduction, lxxx.), not far from our righteous. The old honour is much altered, for we hear of "dishonneurs and losses," p. 259.

As to Consonants, b is inserted in debt, p. 370, an unlucky imitation of the Latin; the same takes place with p, for attempte stands in p. 457. There is a transposition of letters in p. 172, where the King's taxes become taskys, a word used in the 'Cursor Mundi.' In p. 93 "having rewarde to" is written for "having regard to;" this may also be seen in Pecoek. The d is struck out in the middle; for we see Wenstay (Wednesday), written by the learned Botoner, p. 414. The w at the beginning of a word vanishes; bede oman (mulier) is in p. 343; this is often heard in our time. The letter z is constantly written for the old 3, our consonant y.

Among the new Substantives we find hand-gun, warehows, kynsefolke, rydynghoode, fornoone, forecastell. The powerful Suffolk uses the phrase from kynrede to kynrede, p. 122 ; here we now substitute a Latin noun. Chaucer's brew-house now becomes browere, our brewery, p. 250. King Henry VI., in p. 329, is said to threaten, I shal destrye them every moder sone. In p. 462 a house is to be pulled down, every stone and stikke therof. In p. 512 stands (he) and ye bene grete frendes ; here the grete replaces the former good. In p. 428 we hear of xxviii. sayle (naves) ; this sail is one of the few English words that may be either Singular or Plural. In p. 526 lyfflod stands for a man's land, or, as we should say, his estate.

Among the new Adjectives we remark hevedy, our heady, p. 514 ; it was long before the old heafod (caput) parted with its middle consonant. In p. 125 we read that Suffolk was beheaded by oon of the lewdeste of the shippe ; here the adjective takes the new meaning of vilis. In p. 224 tall is used where we should now say fine ; on of the tallest younge men ; proper and tall go together in English ballads. Botoner, in his own phrase, p. 369, writes blontly ; that is, "with little elegance."

King Henry the Fifth's change is imitated in a letter of Parson Howes ; other, like our some, had usually been both Singular and Plural ; but in p. 311 we find otherez, and in p. 404 othyrs ; the older form still lingers in our Bible.

Among the Verbs may be remarked go lose (loose), peke a quarell, hold fote wyth (keep step with), p. 189 ; he turned pale colour, p. 158 ; fysh the water, bear chargys, ley upp money, thei wyllle laboren all that in hem lyeth (Agnes Paston, p. 423) ; breke the mater to, breke aweye (effugere), left for dede, they have as moche as they may do to kep them down, p. 541. Friar Brackley has the curious find no bonys (scruples) in the matere, p. 444 ; a Century later they substituted make for find. In p. 83 stands fall in felaschepe with, the source of our fall in with, and the military fall in. A most curious phrase, where we have to search for a dropped Nominative, stands in p. 361 ; Fastolf ys owyng for his reward ; that is, "money is in owing to Fastolf ;" something like this phrase of the year 1455 has already been seen in 1410. The ruling idea is debetur, not debet. There is another curious confusion of the Verbal Noun with the Active Participle in p. 510, I am yn bildyng of a pore hous; here the two prepositions are not needed; the ungrammatical be a fighting was to come two generations later. In p. 392 something is in doying; here we should now, most incorrectly, drop the in. In p. 360 a verb is dropped; baronies were gotten by Fastolf, and no charge to the King; hence comes and no blame to him. In p. 514 the verb broke takes the new meaning tolerare; it had hitherto expressed only its kindred form frui. In p. 535 certain persons are made for evir; something like the make a man of him of 1320. Seamen are ordered to stryke, p. 85; here the Accusative flag is dropped.

As to the Prepositions, we find Thursday by the farthyst, iii. 425, where by replaces the older at. We have long ago seen out of his wits, out of reason; we now find he is owte of charite with him, p. 393. The after is coupled with nouns, so as to form one word; an aftr mater, p. 540; fore had long been used in this way. A new Preposition appears in p. 85, I cam aboard the Admirall. As to the new words found here, the Dutch vier (quatuor) produced our ferkyn, fourth-kin, since it holds the fourth of a barrel. The same people seem to have given us warff (wharf).

Among the Romance words stand a letter (bill) of exschawnge, p. 78; romer (rumour), flagon, saltsaler, streytly charge hem, to quyte us lyke men, joyn batayle, factors (agents), a debentur, p. 364; to sort things, to sryble, good conducte, an ante date, to audyt accompts, polityk, a servaunt domysticall, (counter) pane, curass, Morysch daunce, solicitour, trotter. In p. 274 stands she laboured of hir child (Ilithyia); in p. 321 to labore the jury, like our "work the oracle." In Norfolk carry hay seems to have been the right phrase, p. 219; some shires talk of leading it. In p. 427 a town is refreshed (refurnished) with ordnance, a French phrase that comes in Froissart; hence "to refresh the memory." The French verb écumer gives us an instrument, here called a skymmer. In p. 480 a piece of linen is said to be of a certain length, countynge lenthe and brede; the Participle is used like Chaucer's considering. The legal verb demur is used, not for morari, but for obstare, in p. 90. We see Teutonic endings in symplesse, malissiousness; and grievous is written gravewis in p. 97, a curious imitation of the old rihtwis; in p. 134 the weapon brigantine is written bregandyrn, as if it had something to do with Teutonic iron; in p. 303 appears a jantylmanly man, where man comes twice over. In p. 172 menage and housold are coupled. A sister of the Pastons speaks of her husband as my mayster, p. 435, much as Mrs. Thrale did; a Norfolk Prior sends a letter to my Sovereyn, John Paston, and subscribes himself your orator, p. 78. A priest is called Doktor Grene, p. 350. In p. 380 we hear of dubble intendementz; this by no means implies the vicious meaning conveyed by the French phrase that we have used for the last 200 years. In iii. 428 very is used by Fastolf in a new sense; my very last wille; it is like making the adjective a Superlative. In p. 514 fumous stands for iratus; the verb fume took this sense in France during the Fifteenth Century. Friar Brackley, in a sermon, uses audacite, affluens, and perfight (perfect).

In 'Gregory's Chronicle,' between 1450 and 1460, we find mention of Beuley Abbey in Hampshire, the place now written Beaulieu; one of the few words that are left to show the old sound of eau in both French and English. Jack Cade's men are called ryffe rafffe; we hear of a londe-lord in connexion with the tenancy of houses, p. 199; the new phrase the aftyr none appears, p. 204. The verbs are put to a rebuke, take (houses) for a terme, leve owte (things). Two men fighting went togedyr by the neckys, p. 202; hence our "set by the ears." In p. 191 stands halfe besyde hyr wytte; it was now long since beside had expressed extra. The French words are his costys (costs) (in the Plural), p. 203; bachelor of devynite; be ilowe (allowed) 2^d, p. 199; here the first syllable must have been mistaken for the Past Participle's prefix; the verb had expressed give credit for a hundred years earlier.

In the 'Rolls of Parliament,' between the years 1450 and 1460, we find an instance of the English habit of docking the final vowel of foreign names ; just as we have done with the names of Machiavelli and Titiano ; in p. 214 we read of Ambrose Spinull (Spinola) of Genoa. The a replaces e, as gaol, not the old geol. At the bottom of p. 280 come the verbs imply and emploie, two forms of the Latin implicare ; both are here used in our sense of the words ; helpour stands for helper. We see Chaucer's markis give way to marquouys, p. 394, the oy being sounded like the French e ; our marquis is a compound of the two forms. The former interesse now becomes interest, p. 185 ; the t being added. In p. 194 servants of the Crown, such as porters, etc., are often styled yomen ; we hear of the clerk of oure Grenecloth, p. 197, and the clerk of our hanaper, p. 317. In p. 182 comes the ill-omened sterre chambre. In p. 285 the phrase their good Lordshippes is employed for domini. In p. 325 appear the silkewymmen, a very old London trade, as we are here told. In p. 204 stand gonne powder and longebowes ; here the adjective and substantive are coupled, to make a sharp distinction from crossbow. The late form mornynge (mane) is stamped with Royal sanction, p. 282. In p. 300 we read of a crue of ccc men ; soldiers, not sailors ; this word is Scandinavian. In p. 225 comes the curious phrase a setter-forth of a shippe, like Pecoock's a rattler out of texts ; it is not often that the adverb stands close to the noun that expresses the agent. In p. 184 we read of the parish of Much Billyng ; this word for magnus is still sometimes found in towns of Southern England, just as Mikel is still used in the North for the same purpose. There is a curious idiom of pronouns in p. 384, in whos handes so evere they be. A habit is now coming in of setting un before Passive Participles ; we have here unspotted and unbrused, p. 280. We see the phrases lie dormant, pight tents, call to remembraunce, put to silence. An Exeter petition to the King, p. 390, begins with shewith (ostendunt) your subjectis ; the word shewith is still used to head petitions to Parliament. We see our common thenne and there for the first time, I think, at full length in p. 282. Both the forms nor and ne are found in p. 294 ; the former was soon to triumph.

Among the Romance words are diabolique, celerite, plenitude, irrecuperable, getee (jetty), delibre (discuss), aniversarye, barreer, defete a tittle, be at diettez (maintenance), p. 293. In p. 280 we see one of our present senses of address; they addressed thaim toward, etc.; in the same page directly expresses "in a straight line." In p. 309 an Act extends; before this time it was stretched. In p. 389 we read of an act of atteindre, in our sense of the word; this very properly belongs to the bloody year 1460. In p. 399 a Northern petition uses catell for pecus; but in the South catelles stood for our chattels for some time after the year 1500.

Many of the pieces printed in 'Hazlitt's Collection' belong to 1460 or thereabouts; they were printed about fifty years later. In vol. i. there are the pieces in pp. 4, 69, 111-152, 196. We see flateré, a great tenement-man (rich in houses, p. 133), long-sided. In p. 135 stands thys ys the schorte and longe; we now transpose these adjectives. Among the Verbs are follow the chase, sell up (chattels). In p. 146 a man has no more goods, but ryght as he in stode (the clothes he stood in). A miser will not lend, but (unless) he wyst why, p. 114; a common phrase now.

There is the Scandinavian frisky, which may also be French. We have to bere offys, pecys of silver, call him foul (names). The word gracious is now applied to a sale of goods, p. 149; it must mean pious. The word nice (fastidious) was now getting the new sense of elegant, like the words dainty or exquisite; that was a neys seyte (seat) is used ironically in p. 8. The word paramour, which might mean virgo in 1290, gains its evil sense in p. 199. In p. 205 stands the emphatic certen sothe; something like our certain sure.

In vol. ii. the pieces to be here considered are in pp. 2, 23, 138. The þ is struck out in Norweste wind. In Substantives there is Barbour's tryst coupled with another noun, trysty tre, p. 154. A juror becomes a swerer, p. 149; this word was applied to those who took the oath to William III., two Centuries later. A squire, when he serves the King in hall, bears a white yard; hence the white staff coveted by English ministers. We read of fallow deer. Men do not talk of Rhodes (the island), as in Wyntoun's time, but of The Rodes, p. 31. We have Clym for Clement.

Among the new Verbs we see angle, fowl. A man, when swearing, has to hold up his hand, p. 56. There is take the mesure of a man, p. 150. We see the old win your shone, p. 30; after this time it was spurs that were won. A great change in the Perfect is seen in p. 30; a man ware velvet; this replaces the old wered; we have already seen the Northern worn. It is not often that a Weak verb becomes Strong, as in this case. Men ring bells backward, p. 153, for an alarm; this phrase is seen in a ballad of Scott's. In p. 42 comes it stode with hym full harde; we should now substitute went for stode. We see the Scandinavian skulle (remus). Among the French words are jennet, dulcimer, dulcet, bowles (for playing), sykamoure.

In vol. iii. of 'Hazlitt's Collection' the pieces of this time may be found in pp. 60 and 100. The initial a is pared away; "this is long of thee" (per te), p. 79, used afterwards by Scott. There is the Dutch word trick, p. 117. In p. 103 something is near, not the length of a lande; here length stands for distance; in Scotland they say, "I will come your length." In p. 113 further is revived as an Adjective after long disuse, "the further side of the hall;" it is here more akin to far than to forth, its old positive. Among the Verbs we see beat him both blacke and blewe, beleewe me (in the middle of a sentence), get him down (in fight), you knowe (at the end of a sentence); a musician blows up; hence our strike up. There is a most curious change from transitive to intransitive in p. 109, a dore will undoe. The swa (so) formerly expressed quoniam; this is continued in p. 109, "you should know your way better, so oft as you come here." In p. 102 a man steals more by a deale; we should say a deal more; here great is dropped before deal. There is the Interjection hey howe, p. 62, leading to our heigh ho! As to the Romance words, the word bombe is seen in p. 68^e; a woman is afflicted crepitu invito, and is told, tempre thy bombe; hence, I suspect, comes bum.¹ The nyce keeps its old sense lascivus, p. 107; and shows its new sense elegans, p. 117, where a wench is proper and nyce; just as young ladies now ask, "Do I look nice?"

There are two old Lollard treatises reprinted by Arber as an appendix to Roy's "Rede me and be not wroth;" they are in pp. 150 and 172. They belong to an age of civil war; see p. 184; but were first printed in 1530. There is the new syns, though sythen is oftener used; both tho and thos may be seen in p. 154. The ship is used to form new nouns, as apostleship. Among the Verbs are bear out (support), break an entail; the deme bears here its Northern sense (arbitrari). There is the phrase "the most cruel enemy that might be," p. 178. We have a new phrase, it is all one as he sayeth, p. 152, the old swa had expressed quasi; in the same page stands say otherwyse than it is. We see how abrode slid from latè to foris, in p. 181; God scattered the Jews abrode among the hethen. The language used by Bede is said to have been Englishe. There are the phrases compile, unequity, to ensue (sequi), entromedle, barbarus, resign up; mortefy (hand over in mortmain) is a sense still known in Scotch law; it comes from the amorteyse, amortesy of p. 161; the long s being mistaken for an f. These Lollard treatises of 1460 were pronounced to be barbarous, when reprinted seventy years later; see p. 170; a fact that shows how our tongue was changing.

In the 'Political Songs of 1458' (Master of the Rolls) we remark that rejose bears the two meanings, gaudere and frui, in one stanza, p. 254; the former meaning was to be the lasting one. There are also the phrases forswear the lond, in every quarter.

There are two ballads of this time in the 'Archæologia,' vol. xxix. There is the well-known expression, the good shype, p. 326; also taklynge, a good stay, shrowthes (shrouds), words well known to sailors. Further on, we see ragged staf, curre dogges. We say, "three Rs running;" in p. 331 we see that the old expression was, thre arres togydre in a sute. There is the phrase as þe world gos, p. 341. In p. 339 there is lay wayte to a thing, and also lie a-wayte to do a thing.

In Halliwell's 'Original Letters of our Kings,' Edward IV. uses foreigners to express "men who are not fellow-citizens," p. 128; something like this usage still prevails in some parts of our country; the sense belonged to forain in French.

The 'Book of Quinte Essence' (Early English Text Society) is a translation from the Latin, about 1460, and abounds in medical terms. In p. 21 we see how our phrase "a little rhubarb" arose; there is first a litil quantite of pulpa; then, a litil of rubarbe. Among the foreign words are lapis lasuly, grose mater, þe splene (which seems to imply cholera, p. 18). A man at death's door is said to be almost consumed in nature, p. 15; the first hint of consumption. The old form of the verb fiche is now changed to fix. We read of a brute beast, and the Latin equality comes instead of the French egalite.

Some poems, edited by Mr. Furnivall in the 'Book of Precedence' (Early English Text Society), belong to this date. We see the contraction Antyny for Antonius, p. 39. There are roppys end, coke fyghtynge, callot (light woman), p. 40, and the name Kate. There is our familiar who ys that? p. 40. In p. 53 stands call her by no vylons name; hence the later call him names. There are a few proverbs, as—pat oftyn ys tornnyd and wende" (p. 39).

"Syldon mossyth the stone

We have fayre wordes brake never bone, p. 45; here we now change the adjective; erly to ryse is fysyke fyne.

Capgrave's 'Chronicle of England' (Master of the Rolls Series) seems to have been compiled about 1460. The writer was born at Lynne, and we see some of his East Anglian forms in levene (fulgur), dyke (fossa), bigge (ædificare), tidyndis, who (quomodo); he has the hard g in give and again, and he uses the Active Participle in and. But he has Southern forms like i-sought, be (been), and o (one). He follows Latin forms when he writes Lodewic (Louis), and Duke Aurelianensis, p. 300 ; Arius, however, appears as Arry, p. 77. He has Manning's phrase, to avale a hood.

Capgrave is fond of casting out vowels in French words, writing banch and punch for banish and punish. We may trace in him the two sounds of oi, for he writes cleystir for cloister in p. 308, and Groyne for Corunna in p. 242. He has the old form Beaumont and the new Beamount in one page, 182. He has foster for forester, like his East Anglian brother Lydgate. The Suffolk habit, seen in 1230, of changing th into d appears in erdequave (earthquake), p. 80 ; here also is the origin of our quaver, k changing into f and v. Our navel is written nowil in p. 82 ; av must have been mistaken for au, and au and ow were both sounded like the French ou. The f was often mistaken for s (fitting to and sitting to) ; in p. 194 enfess is written for enfeff.

Among the Substantives we find the old querne. In p. 130 stands our common "he had not a peny in the world." In p. 365 rusticus is Englished by chorle, and in the next page this becomes carle. The adjective foned (stultus) gives birth to fonednesse, p. 151. We read of Grete Bretayne, whiche is cleped Englonde, in p. 359, the first time, I think, that this grand title is used by an Englishman. The renowned Percy of 1400 is called Herry Hatspore, p. 242. The old Burgeyn (Burgoin) is found, as well as the newer Burgundy, coming from the Latin ; Burgenye, p. 219, seems to be a compromise between them. There is not only Almayn but Germaine, p. 111, showing the influence of the Latin ; the Germanes appear in p. 106 ; Acon stands for Aachen, and Maydenborow for Magdeburg, p. 118.

Among the Adjectives we hear of a fayre-spokyn man, p. 81 ; a curious instance of the Passive Participle replacing the Active ; it reminds us of the Old English heom gesprecenum (illis loquentibus). Our common fayn to fle is in p. 119.

Among the Verbs we remark phrases like take hors, make difficulte, make oth, picche tentis, to poll a man (tondere), p. 234. The verb gore is formed from the gorwound of 1380. To waste is used intransitively in p. 104. A convent is not built but takes place, in p. 153. In p. 187 men swear to do something, "come hem lyf or come hem deth." The three stages of punishment are (rather unusually) set out in their right order, when in p. 190 a man is doomed "to drawyng, hanging, and hedyng." The verb chepe adds the sense of our cheapen to its old meaning buy, p. 180. Capgrave, in one of his earlier writings, uses the phrase happed hym to be, etc., p. 365; in his latest book comes Wyntoun's phrase he happed to mete, etc., p. 288; a good example of the encroachment of the Nominative upon the Dative, and of the journey Southward of Northern forms.

We have often seen but (standing for ne but) used before a Substantive; we now see Daniel but zong led into Babilonie, p. 47. There is a new phrase not half mech (big) inow, p. 132; and in p. 141 stands I had as lef be killid, as, etc.; this phrase, already used in the late Lollard tracts, is the one phrase that still keeps alive the Old English leaf (carus).

Among the Prepositions we remark the new phrase, a man is hanged for his laboure (pains), p. 278.

Among the French words are monstrous, code, antepope, unmanerly, cass (quash), cariage in the sense of currus; here there must have been a confusion with caroche. There are phrases like have a touch of, p. 1; graces (indulgences) were bought in p. 244; this phrase lasted till Strafford's time. There is the curious compound semi-goddess, p. 50, like Shakespere's demi-devil; this replaces Chaucer's half-gods. In p. 190 the King, when judging a traitor, dispensid with him of the peynes; an idiom that we have now changed. Gentil, as in Barbour, adds the meaning mitis to its old sense nobilis, in p. 122. The Pope disguises himself, in p. 309, like a Malandrym; hence perhaps our Merry Andrew, with the usual change of l into r. A large sum becomes a horibil summe, p. 155; this is something like our present use of awful. To purpose articules comes in p. 175; this verb and propose had not yet been marked off from each other. In p. 189 we find he cacchid or caute; a curious instance of double forms. The form Wicleafist, p. 244, coming from the Latin, is preferred as a party name.

In the Coldingham papers for 1461 we see lossez (damna), p. 191. In p. 215 stands on way and odur; we should say, "one way or another." In p. 203 trewbill (trouble) stands for bellum; something is grevous costly in p. 215, and we now often use an adjective for an adverb, as "awful hard."

In the York Wills for 1466 we come upon a draight ox, ii. 285; in the same page a man talks of my sonnes Herre Eure, Maister William Eure, and John Eure; the second son enjoys the title of respect because he was a rector.

In the 'Testamenta Eboracensia,' iii. 185, there is weikly (every week); daily had appeared sixty years earlier, both coming from the North. There is do what hym pleases, p. 197; showing that you in what you please is a Dative. A well-known surname appears in John Dicconson, p. 204. In the same page stands their burds (their boarding when children).

The amusing tale of the Wright's Chaste Wife (Early English Text Society) dates from about the time of Edward IV.'s victory in 1461; the poet speaks "Of roses whyte þat wyll not fade,

 Whych floure all Ynglond doth glade,
 Wyth trewloves medelyd in syght;
 Unto the whych floure i-wys
 The love of God and of the Comenys Subdued bene of ryght."

The old bridale loses its last letter and becomes brydall, p. 3. The b is added, for the old momelen becomes mombyll (mumble), p. 19. The use of ye and thou in the piece is happily marked; the knight, who means to do the craftsman's wife the honour of seducing her, first jauntily addresses her as thou; when she has trapped and half starved him, he uses the more respectful ye, which his lady also adopts. A poor woman is addressed as dame by her betters; she speaks of an absent personage as my lady, p. 16.

In the 'Plumpton Letters' (Camden Society) of 1461 many of the Yorkshire forms may be remarked, such as gar, ky, kirk, thof (quamvis), they deals, gif (si). The word milne, found here, had lost its third consonant all through Southern England. The old maistresse is seen as mistris, p. 15 ; and the well-known name Foljambe is pronounced as we sound it ; Fulgiam stands in p. 21. The old holli (omnino) is now written wholie, p. 11, the form that we keep, at least in writing ; just so home in Lancashire is sounded huome. The old Wyrcestre now becomes Woster, p. 17. In p. 27 the Earl of Northumberland, writing about 1471, turns liflode into livelyhed, our livelihood, using a false analogy. King Edward IV. sends greeting in a letter to certain of his subjects, p. lxx. ; and forbids them to give or shew ungodly language to Plumpton. We see the proper title for a knight's wife in p. 15 ; my lady Ingolshorp, whose ladyship is recovered of sicknes. In p. 2 the phrase a readie man is used in describing a lawyer ; I suspect this comes from rede (consilium). In p. lxx. Edward IV. addresses his lieges as all and every one of you. There is the phrase he is riden to, p. 17, in imitation of he is gone ; also, it is for her to refuse, p. 11 ; here meet should be the third word ; money in hand, p. 5. The Romance words are longanimity, have matters against him, what the matter was, p. 23 ; the non-accomplishment of, cry havok upon ; here the noun is said to represent the old hafoc (accipiter).

There are some London documents, ranging between 1465 and 1468, in Blades' 'Life of Caxton,' pp. 149-151. The verbs are underwritten, lay out money, open business to ; hence our open the case (reveal it). There is a new use of the preposition toward ; a certain sum towarde their costs. Among the Romance words are direct a lettre to you, it is not oure parte to do it. The word adventure or auntre had been hitherto used of knights ; but England was now becoming a commercial country ; hence merchants trading beyond sea are here called aventerers and adventerers ; a century later the same man might be both warrior and trader. We hear of custoses (custodes) of the Mercery, a very English form.

In Gregory's 'Chronicle' (1460-1470) we see Lambeffe written for Lambeth, p. 229. There is the trade of a lokyer, whence comes a proper name. The Salopian coup together of 1350 becomes here cope with, p. 219. There is a curious conciseness of idiom in p. 223, "it was not lost, and never hyt shalle," where be should be the last word. There is the phrase, still common, to bery his lady; that is, to lose her by death, p. 233. In the same page is the scornful interjection bawe! as in 'Piers Plowman.' We see to go farre (in speaking), she was IX myle of (off, that is, distant), p. 213; to show favyr, p. 238.

The French words are rayl (vituperare), p. 229; read lessons (preach sermons), p. 230; þe prevelage will not serve (avail). The chronicler tells us in p. 214 where the strength of an English host has always lain; in the fote men ys alle the tryste (trust).

In the 'Rolls of Parliament,' from 1461 to 1473, we come upon the Welsh proper name Lloit, p. 596. The former entrecourse becomes intercourse, vi. 65; the Latin gaining the day over the French. We see much clipping of consonants when we read of the counties of Not' and Berk', p. 547; in the same page, Lytherpoole stands for our Liverpool; our modern change is like the Russian Feodor for Theodore. The old geol may now be written jayle, p. 488, one of the few English words that still has two lawful forms. The qu of the 'Promptorium' makes way for the Latin ch; chorester stands in vi. 48; nothing like this word in France is found till much later. In p. 18 we see to enjoy londes, where the verb comes in that was to drive out brucan in its old sense; in the page before stands to joye londes; this last verb can now English gaudere alone. The n is clipped in the sentence, men not a (in) werke, p. 506.

Among the Substantives we find fyretonges, drepynghannes, paknedle (the old batte nelde), underwoode. We see kerver (carver) used as a title of honour; Edward IV. writes of a squier for oure body (hence came body guard). We read of the hede of a hous, p. 518; gunner stands for the keeper of artillery in a castle, who has many men under him, p. 543. There is the form handcrafty men and women, p. 506; also man and woman clothmaker, p. 563; it was a pity that we lost our female ending in en. The ness is employed in forming fynes (fineness) and stobournesse; we see both pak-kour and pakkir in one page. We read of Thomas Broun, of the shire of Rutland, vi. 22. In p. 65 there is a grant to the "Duchie Hanze, otherwise called Marchauntez of Almayn." There is the adjective unmanly.

Among the Verbs we remark, to set outward an armee, vi. 4; take seyntwary, make hym sure (surely dead), p. 36; he was put in the bylle, a phrase well known to all Etonians, but it here refers to a bill of Attainder, p. 29. We see repaikke, p. 59.

Among the Adverbs the distinction between de jure and de facto turns up in p. 20; Henry VI. late of dede and not of right kyng.

Among the French phrases an address to Edward IV. refers to beaute of personage, p. 463; this last word (one of Monstrelet's) was also used by Pope with the same meaning, in the 'Rape of the Lock.' We see journey men opposed to householders, p. 506. We read of the III estates, lordes spirituell, lordes temporell, and commons, p. 622. In vol. vi. 4, exhibition stands for maintenance; this sense of the word, which does not come from the French, still survives at the Universities. In p. 65 stand lettres of Margue or reprisale; further on, we read of proprietaryes and owners; in our time the Teutonic word has almost vanished before its Romance synonym. In p. 35 we see another instance of coupling words, welwillers or benevolentes. In p. 479 stands the verb unable, our disable. We have cardes for pleiying, p. 507; brushes, an infourmer, verger, ymposition (tax), in tymes passed. In p. 545 we read of the countie of Wiltes, very different from the old name. In p. 635 comes the Kynges eschaunge, the office whither they brought gold and silver. In vi. 37 men have names of baptisme, surnon, and addition.

In the 'Paston Letters,' from 1461 to 1473, we remark the well-known Norfolk names of Jerningham, Townsend, Gorney, Wodehouse, Wymondham (Wyndham), and Jermy. Some of the old East Anglian forms are still used, such as arn, sal, qwan, levand, beseke, mekil; nor is ousting ne; the new thos (illi) is coming in, replacing tho and thei; it is used by the Earl of Oxford, ii. 421. A gentleman writes at the fardest, iii. 27 ; this reminds us how East Anglia turned burthen into burden two Centuries earlier. We find the proverb, referring to an old rite now gone out, "A man must sumtyme set a candel before the Devyle." Margaret Paston quotes two other saws that date from 1260 at least, "men cut large thongs of other mens lether," ii. 226 ; oftyn rape (haste) rewith, iii. 78.

The a is struck out ; fantsy is in p. 83, which becomes fansey (fancy) in p. 243. The ay replaces a ; we see bayly in ii. 249, while baly comes in the same page ; this contraction of bailiff is now a common surname ; laydy stands in ii. 416. The e replaces a, as der (audeo), meke (facio), Temse, hesty ; there is a distinction made between persone and parson in ii. 307. The e replaces eo in Lenard, iii. 99. The old Bewcham gives way to Becham, ii. 224. The old form manoir (manor) appears as maner, ii. 306, and as maneur, p. 382. The i or y is added, as nowgty (malus), ii. 26 ; it replaces e ; we see it hadde byn, ii. 51 ; wyke, hyr (here), priste, spyde (speed), fyle (feel), agry (agree), beshyche (beseech), hyde (heed). Many of these changes in pronunciation, foreshadowing our present usage, are in the letters of Margery Paston and her son Sir John ; the Northern innovations had now reached Norfolk, and were to arrive at London 100 years later. We see Smith turned into the genteel Smythe, iii. 431. The sound of one o is dropped, when do on (induere) becomes doon (our don), ii. 233 ; the change in doff had preceded this by a century. In the pedigree of the Dukes of Suffolk, ii. 210, their name is written both Pool and Pole. We see exskeus, rebeuc, meuve (move), both Dewk and Duck (dux), sewt (lis), indew ; it cannot be too often repeated that ew, from first to last, unless it follows r, is the most favoured and unchangeable of all English vowel sounds ; it has often encroached upon u. In ii. 356 we see reawyll (rule), showing the sound of the old au, which was like the French ou. There is the form plesyer (voluptas) in iii. 6, which becomes plesur in iii. 30. The form guyde seems to be well established. We see maryache (marriage), ii. 139, showing how every vowel of the word was once sounded.

As to Consonants, we see from the form manslauter, ii. 378, how completely the sound of the old gh had died out. The former ploge is now written plowe, ii. 286, which is often seen in our time. The hu (quomodo) is written howghe, iii. 15; and hwi becomes whyghe, iii. 94. We have Jernemuth in ii. 97, and Yermouth in the foregoing page. The p is inserted in Thompson, ii. 46. The d is struck out, for Kirkcudbright is written Kirkhowbre, ii. 46. The name Hobart is spelt Hobard, ii. 368, whence comes Hubbard. The d is replaced by th; ther means audeo in ii. 195; perhaps this is a confusion with the now vanishing verb thar. The l is struck out, Alnwick is written Annewyke, iii. 432; enemies becomes elmyse, ii. 309. The rt is struck out in the middle of Fortescue, which is written Foskew, iii. 9, just as forester became foster. Margaret Paston, iii. 78, talks about my nawnte; nuncle was to come later in Shakespere's plays. An s, as well as other letters, is struck out in the old Glowsestyr, ii. 357, which appears as Glowsetyr (Gloster), ii. 358. The old form ilde (insula) is once more seen in iii. 93.

Among the new Substantives stand hedermoder (luggermugger, ii. 28), bald batt (ball-bat, ii. 125), undershireff, pothok, choppe (ictus), pakthred, delyng (conduct, iii. 4). We see lyklyhod replacing Chaucer's liklihed; the ship is added to foreign words, as serchorship; a Romance ending is added to a Teutonic root, as stoppage, ii. 221. There are the proper names Dawson, Pytte, Jakys Son; we see a sharp jibe at yonge Wyseman, otherwise callyd Foole, iii. 32. Our noun work now often means incommodum; they make us werke, iii. 92. In iii. 481 stands the phrase man of the world; we now put a slightly different meaning on the phrase, which used to be opposed to religious life; in the same page comes man of livelode; we should now change this last word into fortune. A sharp distinction is drawn between lyffe and lyfflode, ii. 370. We read of wynfall wod in ii. 176, the source of our windfall. The old reke, little known to the South of Norfolk, is used for fumus; seven of the belle (clock) is in iii. 61, a future sea phrase. The word back was now much used in compounds; bak rekenyngges comes in ii. 224. There is the new phrase a writinge of olde hand, p. 285, which we now make more concise. The word barwde, as in the 'Promptorium,' is applied to a man, p. 299. In p. 347 we see humys and hays (hums and haws) for the first time.

Among the Adjectives are knavyssh, trew hertyd, prystly, a thanklesse offyce. There is lavish, which seems to be Teutonic, not French. We hear of men that ben knowyng in that behalf, ii. 360; the same meaning is conveyed in iii. 18 by a wytty felaw. To come stronke (strong), ii. 375, means to come in great force; we say, "came out strong." The old mad means avidus; "they are madde upon it," iii. 71. A younger brother addresses the elder as rythe worchypfull broder, ii. 258; also as Syr. Margaret Paston is hailed by her husband as myn owne dere sovereyn lady, ii. 235. Sir John Paston addresses his sire as my ryth reverrend and worchepfulle fadyr, ii. 244.

As to the Pronouns, we have he shuld be servid the same, ii. 48; by the same token, ii. 134. There is the Reflexive Dative, I fere me, ii. 82, which also appears in the 'Coventry Mysteries' about the same time. There is a curious substitute for all men in iii. 52, you most of eny on man alyve; Pecoock had employed a phrase something like this. In iii. 59 any he stands for any man; Shakespere writes of the shes. One Paston declares in iii. 75, I am not the man I was. Instead of some one we see the very early What-calle-ye-hym, iii. 104. In iii. 33 comes beffor Twelthe, referring to 6th January; we now usually confine this particular numeral to August and grouse-shooting, except in Twelfth-cake.

Among the Verbs we remark have a plowe going, they myght not cheese (choose) but, take out the patent, take a ferme of him, shift for yourself, fall out (quarrel), do him a shrewd turne, kepe an howsolde, breke up howsold, the jury found, etc., make a serche, make up a sum, make sport, make promes, I wyle rubbe on, make him or mar him, it schal do no hurt, take my part, take no thowth (thought), I took it upon my sowle that, etc., make war upon, make a man partye (to), put her in rememberawns, put our tryst (trust) to, pyke it owt, give her warning, lead him a dance, cast calves, se hym saffe, sett at lyberte, set (them) at one, he is lodgyd at, etc. In ii. 26 stands she wost ner howe to do for mony; here do means rem agere, but we should now put what for the howe. In ii. 64 we have mak hym yonger than he is; we should now put out after hym. In ii. 205 besiegers are said to sit uppon us; the phrase is in our day used for male tractare. John Paston means to take assise against a man, iii. 482; hence our "take the law of him." In ii. 348 stands eete yow owte at the dorys, our out of doors. In ii. 254 comes hold up your manship (keep up your pluck). Up to this time English knights had won their shoes; in iii. 102 we find wynne your sporys. Margaret Paston, like Manning, did not use the shall and will as we do; in iii. 78 she writes I will love (like) hym to be a good man; also, I wold be sory (if, etc.). The Passive Voice is making strides; I have don as I wolde be don for, ii. 375. There is a new use of the Past Participle in ii. 288; "he took it, unknowyn to the priour;" this is very concise. In iii. 47 a man is called the best spokyn archer, like Capgrave's fair spoken. There is a curious change of meaning in iii. 483, "he harped upon the thought." To axe (a couple) in chyrche appears in iii. 46. To crosse writing is in iii. 47. In iii. 57 stands he is evyr choppyng at me; we should now say, "cutting at me." We see Wyntoun's it is woryn ought, iii. 73; the new Perfect ware stands in p. 141, replacing wered. There is a curious attempt at turning a French verb into a Strong verb, he was scope (escaped), iii. 17.

Among the Adverbs appears the streyt weye of King James I., ii. 38, which here seems to refer to place, not to time, like the French direct. In ii. 236 we have "in that yere, or ther aboutes," which is new. There are phrases like I reke not thowe he did it (etiamsi), iii. 87; he was entreated like a jentelman, ii. 205; weell out off the weye, iii. 92; he is thorow with him (wholly on his side), ii. 299; here the preposition is turned into an adverb. There is the curious idiom, ye schall not be longe without a byll, iii. 47. In iii. 100 stands, almost for the last time, the hoary old phrase, with thys that (on condition that). The but, in the sense of quin, is developed, there ys but few but they know, etc., ii. 263; in this last we should now drop the they. In ii. 291 nyer (near) stands where our nearly (ferè) was to be written a Century later. The as is used in a new sense, if ther were c of hem, as ther is non, yet have they no tytill, ii. 211; here the idea must be, "which is no true fact."

As to Prepositions, the at is used, as in our at length, in the sentence, at the longe wey (in the long run), Godde woll helpe, p. 351; there is also (they) were at words, p. 105. In iii. 481 comes, he profited us not to value of one groat; in Old English this would have been much more concise, to one groat. In ii. 372 stands (they will die) to the grettest rebuke to you; hence comes to your shame. In ii. 358 stands it was refusyd by avise; here the last two words express deliberately, advisedly. Shakespere's great comic hero hopes that the Chief-Justice goes abroad by advice. In ii. 207 men are in fer of ther lyvys; this of expresses anent, and we still keep this unusual employment of the preposition in this phrase. The idiom connected with the old beswican is continued in I was deseyvyd of (certain) men, ii. 246; hence our baulk of, cheat of. The phrase in the name of had hitherto been confined to Scripture; we now have I labored hem yn Yelverton's name, iii. 445. Capgrave's phrase again appears, a man is to have something for his labour, ii. 373; we should say, "for his pains."

Among the words akin to the Dutch is blaver (our verb blather); Edward IV. intends, in iii. 98, to be a stiffeler between his quarrelsome brothers; that is, to stifle their dispute; the word is Scandinavian, as also is queasy.

Among the new Romance words is the pane of a window, from pagina; straggle seems akin to stray; and mangle is from the Low Latin mangulare, foreshadowed by Wyntoun's mank. We have ferror (farrier), ipedemye (epidemic), agonye, gayle delyverye, juntor (jointure), boke of remembraunce, a splayyd hors, a comon carier, a lees (lease), saffegard, incedentes, contermaund, decay, qualified with, recompense, suppena, it concerns him, insurreccion, enforsyd to, it is his own default (fault), interlyne, asserteyn (certify), kasket, probatt, entyrpryce, fensyng (inclosure), sorepe (sirrur). In ii. 4 and 29 we see the twofold meaning of bribery; as before remarked, it might express both robbery and corruption. A new sense of dress is seen in iii. 3; a young Paston, wounded at Barnet Field, is dressid by a serjon. In ii. 78 catell seems to bear its Northern meaning of pecus. In iii. 436 we hear of a stokke gonne (gun) with III chambers; a new sense of the last word; in iii. 441 culverin appears in the Latin form colubrina. We see a repetition, in ii. 314, of Chaucer's kepe it close; a little further on a man is called close (unblabbing). In iii. 35 a man can make his peace by no meane; in ii. 107 a man fond the meanys that something should be done; a new use of the noun. In iii. 27 your quarters is used for "your neighbourhood." An abusive name comes under the head of language, ii. 112; hence our "bad language." In ii. 360 the Queen is attendid wurshepfully; a new sense of the verb. In p. 358 young Paston offers his servyse to a great Lady; hence our phrase "my service to you." He, when writing to his mother, subscribes himself your humbylest servaunt, iii. 8. The Duke of Norfolk is addressed as the right hyghe and myghty Prince; my Lord the Duke; your good Grace; your hyghnesse, iii. 75, 76; we afterwards read of my Lady of Norffolkes grace, 157. The hostess of the Black Swan is called Mestresse Elysabeth Hyggens by young Sir John Paston, iii. 18. We should do little business now without "a power of attorney;" in ii. 68 a letter of attournay made in the strengest wise that ye can is asked for. There is the phrase passe your credens (give your word), ii. 369; we still use pass in this sense. The form Geane, standing for Genoa, is borrowed from France, ii. 293; so the French Gawnt is preferred to the true Ghent in iii. 79; these two foreign forms are used by Sir John Paston, a Court-bred youth. We see in ii. 300 I kannot fynde hyr agreable that, etc.; the old form was, she is agreed that, etc.; we still say, I am agreeable (willing). In ii. 145 a man hath put exception onto certain persons; we should substitute take for put. The noun fee begets a verb; for we read of the King's feed men, ii. 145; the verb council is found in ii. 360. The word comfort may now refer to a man as well as a thing; he is a grete comfort to me, writes Margaret Paston, ii. 187. In ii. 241 a matter is gydyt in a certain way; this sense still lives in Scotland; as also does plee (lis), ii. 306. In ii. 387 servants seek for new servysys; this Plural is something new. In ii. 352 stands they wold not dampne ther soules for us, a new phrase. We see the source of our "make a fortune," when the founder of the famous Pole family is said to have been a Hull merchant grow (grown) be fortwne of the werld, ii. 210. In ii. 324 crusty old Fastolf swears, mevyd and passyoned in his soule; hence comes our passionate. At elections for Parliament, men geve ther voyses to candidates, iii. 52; we still "have a voice" in the matter. In iii. 70 we read of standardis, that is, standard trees. In iii. 102 comes the sporting phrase a brace a growndes (greyhounds). In iii. 25 currants appear as reysonys of Corons. In iii. 33 a money grant is expected from a convocacion of the clergy.

In the book on English Gilds (Early English Text Society, p. 370) there is a Worcester document of the year 1467. We see the Southern form brugge (pons) and the Severn fuyre and huyde; there is both croys and crose; but the English of the piece, in general, resembles the London standard. We see fredom of the burgesshippe, smale ale, the Kynge's pease. There are the Verbs make feith (oath), make out a capias, put aparte, set up a craft; there is a curious Passive form in p. 400, this is done for serche to be hadd. The form oftener replaces the old ofter, p. 378. Among the French words are recorder (of the town), Baillies (both here and at Exeter, p. 331). In p. 407 a journeyman is distinguished from a craftsman. There are the verbs to try a man, to rente ground, commit to prison, to wage law (like war), men find a person defectyf (guilty).

In Rymer's 'State Papers' (1461-1473) we find Herry and Harry close together in p. 710; also the goeing downe of the Soune, p. 509; Keper of the Seal, p. 579; rightwis (rightful) king, p. 714; give in complaints, p. 788; a question ryses, p. 579; answer at their parell, p. 523; to proport (purport), p. 788. A diet is to be kept between England and Scotland, p. 717.

But the most valuable Scottish work of this time is the poem on Wallace by Henry the Minstrel or Blind Harry (edited by Dr. Jamieson in 1869); it may date from 1470. There is much here in common with Barbour, such as oi for u, w for v; the b struck out, as temir for timber; fling used transitively; suppose used for si; and the phrases on ster, schor, tryst, get on fute. We know how Northern England turned the a of the South into the sound of French ê, so far back as 737. We now see madeym written for madame, p. 209; the old râd, the Southern rode, is here seen as raid, and this has been the longer-lived of the two forms. Manning's Scandinavian word squyler now becomes scudler, p. 97, whence comes scullery; the French escouillon (dishclout) must have had some influence here. The most remarkable clipping of Consonants is the turning of Barbour's French discourriour (scout) into skourriour, p. 55; hence "to scour the country," which has nothing in common with the Teutonic "scour the floor." The consonant at the end is often clipped in the true Scotch fashion; thus we have pow (pull), sel (self), befaw (befall), aw (all). The old French scarmish appears as scrymmage, p. 39.

Among the new Substantives are ourset (overset, defeat), shipburd (shipboard), mudwall werk, p. 337; we see salis (sails) standing for naves, p. 225; we now, however, make a difference, as to Singular and Plural, between five sails of a ship and five sail out at sea; sail has here followed our construction of yoke and pair. The Southron enemy are called Saxons, though Blind Harry himself writes good Northern English. We see the old goym (guma, homo) in p. 194; but this is written groyme, p. 123. A pirate, in p. 225, is called the Red Reffayr; the old reafere (spoliator) was soon to be confined to the sea, at least in England, and to be supplanted by the Dutch form rover. The expressive word unlaw, that had long dropped out of Southern use, stands in p. 144. The Romance et was tacked on to a Teutonic word; we see howlat in p. 286.

The new Adjectives are dewyllyk (devilish); this ending is also added to French words, as chyftaynlik. The word awful is much employed by the Scotch of our days in the sense of valdè; in p. 69 we read of ane awfull hard assay. There is a difference between a fish that is landed and a landyt man (terræ dominus); the latter stands in p. 276. The word awkward had been used as an Adverb by Hampole; it is turned into an Adjective in p. 74, as in one of the earlier Robin Hood ballads of the North. The same change befalls forward; in p. 249 it is turned into a synonym for zealous, and from it is compounded a new adverb, forthwartlye, p. 301.

Among the Verbs we find play a part, make a ster, make (get) quynt of, p. 146; besy him to, etc.; burd (board) him (of a pirate); byd thi tym. There is the alliterative do or de (die), p. 60; a favourite phrase of Scotchmen ever since. The verb kerve, even so late as this, is used of a soldier cutting his foe's neck. In p. 156 men maid tham for the flycht; hence our "make for a place." The verb clap had hitherto meant pulsare; but in p. 206 Wallace clappyt harnes on his leg. In p. 227, when at sea, he bids his steersman lay thaim langis the bourd (along the board); a well-known technical use of the verb. Instead of saying "I bet my head," the phrase in p. 258 is my hed to wed; perhaps it was owing to this phrase that the to, standing here before the Infinitive, triumphed over for and against in betting sentences. The to (Latin dis) is still prefixed to some verbs in this poem. In p. 13 young Wallace treats an Englishman to the thou; the indignant rejoinder is made, "quham thowis thow, Scot?"

The old Adverb timliche is now altered into tymysly; hence came the Northern timeous, something like righteous and wrongous, where the ous stands for an Old English wis.

There are some peculiarly Scotch words, such as craig (guttur), layff (reliquum), inch (insula), a corruption of the Celtic innis.

The French words are fraudful, in frount, a natyff Scottisman. There is excedandlye, which Tyndale was to make so common. Wallace is called in p. 20 the Aperse

(A per se) of Scotland; something like this had appeared in Chaucer. In the same page we read of a sword's temper. The old number is used in the Plural; with nowmeris (turbæ mony ane, p. 164. Edward I. is said, in p. 311, to have forced Salysbery oyss (use) upon the Scotch clergy, while he burnt the Roman books. The Virgin acted as convoyar to Wallace, p. 168; this form of the verb has always had a more exalted and protective sense than the other form, convey. In p. 206 Wallace croysst him (crossed himself); this is almost the last appearance in our island of the French form of cruc-em, but we must except croisade. In p. 225 extasy stands for an agony of despair. In p. 224 we hear of a gud gay wynd; this gay is still much used for valdè in Scotland; like the English a jolly good wind. In p. 227 we see God gyd our schip! gude guide us is still a favourite Scotch cry of surprise. The word barge is used for a fine sea-going ship. The poet, or his transcriber, can make nothing of the French avoué (advocate); so in p. 134 St. Andrew is called the wowar of Scotland. In p. 238 turngreys is used for a winding-stair; something like turnstyle. In p. 17 a kinsman of the hero's is called the Squier Wallace; we should now dock the. In p. 106 an Englishman, mockingly polite, greets Wallace thus—

“Dewgar, gud day, bone Senyhour, and gud morn !”

These French phrases are requited with a little Gaelic. An intruding bishop has rents given him in commend, p. 256; this last word we now write commendam.

The ‘Coventry Mysteries’ (Ludus Coventrice, by Mr. Halliwell) are important, as they were compiled so near to Shakespere's birthplace. They bear the date 1469, and show us the speech of the Warwickshire folk about the time of his great-grandfather's birth; they give us also a foretaste of the dialogue in ‘Middlemarch.’ Being compiled upon the Great Sundering Line, they display a mixture of Northern and Southern forms. Thus we have both mekyl and meche, chylde and childeryn, tyl hym and to hym, sin and sith, beteche and betake, the two Imperatives thinkys and lystenyth, the Present Participle ending both in ande and inge. There are the Northern tydandis, arn, tan (capere), tyth (cito); ken (scire), take tent to, go thy gate, in no kynnys wyse, tende (decimus), kyrke. On the other hand, we find the Southern her, hem, suche, weren, i-born, kusse, buschop, o (unus); the Infinitive in yn comes often, especially in stage directions. We are reminded of the 'Blickling Homilies,' written about 500 years earlier, by the e substituted for i or u, as in unkende, fer (ignis), and many other such; this is a mark of the shires bordering on Salop, as is won (unus), p. 147. We see some of Orrmin's phrases, as take on (proceed), p. 297; on lofte (aloft), p. 325; forthwith, nor, howte (vituperare), p. 182; heyle (salutare), p. 293; eyn (oculi). There is the Midland we han (habemus). We see stow (compscere), p. 217, sweting, come by (adipisci), p. 263, lesser; phrases peculiar to the Western part of England, as we remarked before; also the qu (replacing hw) of the 'Havelok;' the chyse, shrill, and round followed by an Accusative, forms which had appeared in the 'Alexander.' There are some phrases that give us a foretaste of Shakespere, well met, hit the pin, here a lythe (hic jacet), p. 319, where the a represents he; and the unusual dolour, p. 327; there is something like a well-known proverb of his in p. 367, trewthe dyd nevyr his maystir shame. The author seems to have copied the first lines of the 'Harrowing of Hell,' the play of 1280, in p. 346. We see the long Latin stage directions in p. 149 and elsewhere. Alliteration is still popular; in p. 100 a promise is given to be true bothe terme, tyme, and tyde. The usual homely diction of the plays is exchanged for the finest and longest Romance words, when a Prophet, or an Angel, or even the Devil is speaking; see p. 240. Latin words are often preferred to their French children.

As to Vowels, die (mori) is written day, p. 250, showing the old sound of ie. It seems that there must have been some difference of sound between ay and e; for in p. 5 the rimes mayde, afrayde, etc., are contrasted with the rimes lede, dede, etc. The i is clipped at the beginning, for tys stands for it is, p. 284, another Shakesperian token. The e replaces i, as pekyd for the pikid of 1440; pekyd schon, p. 241.

As to the Consonants, the g is softened, for we have wagour (wager) instead of the old waiour, p. 45. The French attacher becomes takk (astringere), p. 319. The gh is completely lost in the middle of a word, as syeng (suspiratio), p. 39. The initial di is clipped; we have splayed, not displayed, p. 242; hence a splay foot. We see w written for v, as dowe for dove, p. 48. The x is constantly used for s, as in Norfolk; we see xal for sal, shall.

Turning to Substantives, we find the Proper Names Kate, Sybyly (Sibby), also Symme Smalfeyth and Letyce Lytyltruste, p. 131. In p. 241 we hear of a shert of feyn Holond. A woman is called a stynkynge byche clowte, a scolde, and a sloveyn. We see the old confusion between Teutonic and Romance, when in p. 297 Gethsemane is called a zerd (yard, garden). The Verbal Nouns continue, whantynge stands for lack in p. 44. The Latin pedissequa seems to have suggested footmayd, p. 72; our footman preserves a trace of this. We find abyde a qwyle, p. 73; these last two words were later to be joined and made to appear like an Adverb. The loss of the Genitive ending is remarkable, when Christ is called Joseph and Maryes sone.

Among the Adjectives are bare-leggyd, a very different form from the old bare-foot and bare-head. On the other hand, the old sliper (lubricus) still stands, soon to be confounded with slideri. The word careful is used for tristis, p. 53, when Abraham, about to slay Isaac, calls himself a careful fadyr. The Americans talk of having a good time; in p. 319 we find his good days xul be past.

As to Pronouns, we see brothers and sisters address each other with the ye, not with the thou; which is most different from the French usage; see p. 223. There is a curious instance in p. 126 of he being applied to a man, who has not been named, a token of close familiarity; Elizabeth describes the Angel's promise to her, and goes on, referring to her husband, and hym thought nay; here Zachariah has not as yet been mentioned.¹ The which is much employed as a Masculine Relative. The emphatic that is now made to stand, as in Gower, at the head of the sentence; "hath any man condemned thee?" "That hathe ther nought" (not), p. 222; here also we see the verb done dropped after the hath, and any man is omitted. The old manifold is strangely corrupted in the sentence, God thou dost greve many a folde, p. 138. There are a few corrupt Plural Genitives, not destined to live much longer, sour altheris (omnium) leche, p. 202, and sour bothers (amborum) stryffe, p. 28; there is also her tweyners (duorum) metyng, p. 125.

Among the Verbs we see the phrases take it or ellys lef (leave), thin herte is sett to serve God, I fere me grettly, I am aschamyd to, etc., whedyr (whither) they arn bent (bound), it wyl be longe or (ere) thou do thus, p. 207, as in the 'Paston Letters,' take him to grace, telle no talys. There is I pulle oo draught, p. 142, whence comes our "taking a pulle at a tankard." We see make good face, p. 269; hence our put a good face on it. We have, in p. 136, do this, or I xal make sow; here the Infinitive is dropped after make you. The Verb slake may govern an Accusative or not; to slake hungyr, p. 208; sorwe doth slake, p. 229. The prefix un is often set before the Verbs and Participles, as uneten, unbegete, unlose. The verb crak is applied in a new sense; in p. 325 stands my lypys gyn crake. The if that ze plese in p. 363 shows the rise of one of our commonest phrases. In p. 142 stands put at (to) repref, a future Biblical phrase, the last word meaning dedecus.

Among the Adverbs we remark sum way, p. 40, the parent of our somehow; here an in is dropped. The happier sense of our sore comes out strongly in thei plese God sore, p. 82. In p. 335 stands I se, I wote nevyr how, where a verb is dropped after the last word. The call come away! is now commonly used in Scotland, where in the South we say come along; in p. 132 the audience are invited to the play by the phrase com away! this in Chaucer's time had been come off. We know Byron's far as the breeze can bear, where as is dropped before the first word; in p. 384 stands ys there ony renogat, fer as ye knawe? We often use our sure as an Adverb; in p. 352 comes sekyr, this is good. In p. 223 stands woundyrly seke (sick); hence the old-fashioned adverb woundily.

Among the Prepositions, of is supplanted by from in clene from synne, p. 140; aliene from had come in seventy years earlier, and had brought in a Romance construction. To rede on a book is in p. 103, one of the phrases that show the close connexion between the old in and on.

There is the Interjection out, out (heu), p. 46, which lasted long in England; and in p. 125 stands a! my God! to express surprise. We find the Celtic word prong, and the Dutch sloven.

Among the many French phrases we see try out the trewthe, expound it out; past, present, and future, p. 70; it wyl be straunge if he leve. In p. 115 Gabriel is called God's masangere expresse; we have since dropped the first of these two words. Latin is preferred to French, when adultrye replaces the old avoutrie in p. 10; it is the same with infaunte, p. 51, and regal. We see not only revere, but also the verb reverens, p. 20. In pp. 63 and 132 lay (lex) stands for "way of life;" in Oliver Twist the thieves talk of "the kinchin lay." The term audyens is applied to the spectators of the plays; they are called sovereynes in p. 79, Shakespere's my masters. The Teutonic er is added to the old French parishen in p. 71; the rule for a priest's expenditure is thus laid down—

"So xulde every curat in this werde wyde
 zeve a part to his chauncel iwys,
 A part to his parochoneres that to povert slyde,
 The thryd part to kepe for hym and his."

When we find a form like comfortacion, p. 116, and moralysacyon, p. 244, we see how easily ruin became ruination after this time. The word material appears as an Adjective, p. 208. Our common "I am afraid that you did it," referring to the Past, comes more than once. The old pynne and the new pynnacle, meaning the same, are seen side by side in p. 208; Satan, tempting Christ, says—

"Up to this pynnacle now go we,
 I xal the sett on the hygest pynne."

The Latin mora had been Englished in many ways; it is written delacion in p. 248. The Latin seriatim is turned into seryattly, p. 273. The former verb travail us becomes trobél us, p. 294. We find dubytacion, lyberary, intelligence (news, p. 125), anameryd (enamoured), metaphesyk, reynes (renes), roberych (rubric), excuse me, ravenous.

In 1469 Sir Thomas Mallory compiled from various French books the History of King Arthur and his Knights; this was printed by Caxton a few years later, and the work, a pattern of sound Old English, has been reprinted again and again, down to our own day.¹ The compiler was a Northern man, as we see by his prefixing for to Verbs, and by his using what will we do? i. 125; what is your will with me? iii. 51; gaynest (proximus), i. 270; give back (regredi), i. 192; in iii. 120 his everilk has been altered by Caxton into everyeach. In a chronicle, quoted in the Preface to the Plumpton papers, p. xevi, Sir William Malary is mentioned along with many other Yorkshire knights in 1485. There are in this work more Teutonic words, now obsolete, than would have been used by a Southern writer; Caxton's own early translations are far more modern in diction.

As to the Vowels, e is added; for Chaucer's hoor becomes hore, our hoary, i. 86. The old lein, the Participle of lizen (jacere), is written lyen, p. i.; the form lien remains in our Prayer Book; ie had always in the South been pronounced like the French ê. The d is inserted in ridge (dorsum).

Among the Nouns we see hough-bone (huckle bone), iii. 32; in my days (time); hot as any stew, iii. 2; short breathed, better winded.

As to the Verbs, we see ride on Maying (a new Verbal noun), do thy worst, went to the ground (in Milton's sense), to be nighted (benighted), rather differing from Manning's use of the verb; he will never make man (become a good soldier), i. 234, unbolted, run wild, set hand to. There is the verb hem, iii. 16, when a sound is made to arrest attention. The to (dis) is sometimes prefixed to Verbs in the good old way, as all to-shiver, all to-hew; but this all to now began to be mistaken for omnino or vehementer; hence we here see all to beat, all to scratch, all to besweat, iii. 51 ; this corruption is employed by Tyndale and More, and lasted down to 1700. A man is said to be more than half dead, iii. 327.

Among the French words stand labouring man, an hard case, by no manner of meanes, ii. 2 ; place of worship (respectable house), bay window, estrange herself from. Mallory was so literal that he translated the cry aux armes ! by at armes ! i. 27. The word promise gets the new meaning of assure, iii. 216, as in our asseveration, "I promise you." In i. 109 a knight is described as full of good parts ; this is the sense of the word that Lord Macaulay was so fond of. In i. 263 a lady makes curtesie to a man down to the ground ; here the noun slides into the expression of an attitude. There is in ii. 160 the proverb, "hard it is to take out of the flesh that is bred in the bone."

The 'Play of the Sacrament' (edited for the Philological Society) is interesting as the first English play that is not based upon a Scriptural subject. It must have been compiled about 1470, and seems due to Norfolk ; there are some uncommon words found also in the 'Promptorium ;' there is arn (sunt), ylke (idem), a late instance of this word, also the hard g, as goven, not the usual yeven. The ow supplants g ; for a famous German port is written Hamborowhe, p. 108. The o is replacing the sound of French ou ; for we have here sole (anima) and knoest (scis). There is the new form ah, not a, p. 118.

Among the Substantives are player (of an interlude), bone setter. There is boldero, some part of man's frame, which has given rise to an English surname. There is the new Verbal noun firing, and the phrase a great meny of Jewys, p. 136 ; the of, after the French word, was soon to be dropped. The dom replaces French endings ; as dukedom.

Among the new Verbs are untaught, kepe his howre, a new sense of kepe.

There is the new nay than, used at the beginning of a sentence ; expressing not denial but acquiescence, p. 126.

The French words are bank (of money), the adverb masterly, fruition, punch (an awl), p. 114, the audience (the spectators), represent a play. A man wishes for the deliverance of an article to him, p. 116 ; we have since coined delivery to express the shade of meaning here denoted. A leech says he saves lives with prattise, p. 126 ; hence a physician's practice. A servant is directed to brushe intruders away, in the same page ; Wyntoun had used this verb intransitively. A master bids his servants tenderli to tende me tyll (attend to me), p. 111 ; this adjective seems to have been confused with the verb ; for to tender a thing (attend carefully to it) is in constant use for the next Century. Occleve had already had the phrase.

A second Version of the 'Gesta Romanorum' seems to have been compiled about 1470 ; at least we see ware for the old wered, p. 395, which is found in the 'Paston Letters' about that date.¹ This text is far more Northern than the Salopian text of 1440 ; we have Manning's go a good pace, also kirke, arne, alse longe as, thou knowes, both mekille and mych, lefte for bilefte (mansit), to-morne (cras).

In p. 48 Layamon's Gornouille becomes the Gonoryll so well known to us. There is the new Substantive pokefull. The word stole still keeps its dignified meaning of sedes in p. 418, not having come down to the sense of scabellum, as in Norfolk.

Among the Adjectives we see moste myghtiest, p. 423. In p. 405 we have both forms, rightful and rightwise, used for justus.

We see, among the Verbs, drynke it up, a sperite walks, ye han nought to do here. In p. 35 the Paston put out eyen is substituted for the do out yen of the older Version.

Among the Adverbs we see why so? A request is made in p. 410 ; the Southern answer I nille becomes that shall I not.

As to the Prepositions, we have I will make with the a covenante of ten agaynes oon that, etc., p. 374 ; our sportsmen have now wonderfully shortened this betting phrase.

As to French and Latin words, we find transite, used both as a noun and as a verb. A moral lesson is drawn from grammar in p. 416, and all the fallyngis or cases are named. We hear of a woman welc enfourmyd, p. 396; of the Rialles, p. 408, whom Miss Burney calls "the Royalties." A jurroure (juror) seems to have little differed from an extorcioner in this age; see pp. 372 and 386. Children are arrayed nysely (elegantly), p. 388; the new sense of the word. Our unstedefast was being supplanted by unstable, soon to become a Biblical word. We see vecious, ruynouse. There is a pun in p. 417, turning upon eyre, which expresses both hæres and aer.

The 'Revelation of the Monk of Evesham' (Arber's Reprints) seems to have been translated from the Latin about 1470; it was printed about 1482; I suspect that it was compiled not far from Tyndale's birthplace. We see the new words and forms, behave, ware (induit), not wered; thoes (illi) and dyke (fossa) have come down from the North, while thylke appears only once. But the old Imperative sechith remains, and the Present Plural ends in en, as they desiren; these forms were soon to drop. There are Salopian forms and words like mekylle, horrabulle, seche (talis), doers, hethir to; there is the Worcestershire gyve (catena); and Trevisa's Gloucestershire phrase, three nyghtis togedyr. Both her and their stand for illorum; the South and North meet in "a neybur of herns" (hers), p. 70. Many of the new words and phrases I mention here were fifty years later to be inserted by Tyndale, another son of the Severn land, in our Version of the Bible. Among these is the new sense of the verb worship.

As to Vowels, the i is replaced by o, as hedlong. The u is inserted in sepulcur, p. 93, much as we pronounce it. There is tedusnes, and also tedeusnes, p. 76. The old sceos (calcei) becomes schewis. Among the Consonants we find d changed into th, as hethur (huc); Tyndale was fond of this. The þ is represented either by th or y; yow is constantly written for thou, and this perhaps helped to supplant ye and thou by you. The w is prefixed to vowels, as wolde (senex); also to h, as whore (canus); it is struck out, for home (quem) replaces whom. The r is added, for lesse becomes lessur (minor), one of Tyndale's forms. There is the new Adjective onspekable. Among the Pronouns we remark that after, unlike other prepositions, is not prefixed to one another, as the new usage of this age enjoined; in p. 20 the phrase is one after a nothyr, following the former construction of all prepositions. There is the new phrase any lenger (longer); "he knew not that it were any synne," where any supplants a. The old me (man) has been dropped since Audley's time; we see how myght a man sey, etc., p. 46.

Among the Verbs we see schynynd instead of shone, p. 108. In p. 77 we have both the old holpyn and the new helpyd. A new phrase for the Future, a phrase now always in our mouths, comes in p. 43; a soule was goyng to be broughte, instead of shulde be broughte; this reminds us of the Old English he gæþ rædan. There are new phrases like have any suspycyon, dead and gone. The old Teutonic rap (auferre) is confused with the Latin; hence we see the Participle rapt. In p. 72 take stands for intelligere, as in our "I take it." In p. 105 the saints worship Christ; in p. 87 Christ worships His servant, that is, "does honour to him;" it was unlucky that one English verb should come to express both adorare and colere. There is the medical verb cup in p. 32.

Among the Adverbs there is fer and brode, p. 68, where we should make the last word wide; in p. 103 stands an evyn heyre with me (co-heir).

As to the Prepositions, we have many of myne acquentans, p. 41; cruel apone (them), p. 57; whence "hard upon them." There is for a more wondyr, p. 22; here a preceding what may be held is dropped.

We see the German noun brack (bush), our brake, p. 40.

The Romance words are conteyne (restrain) him, expedyent, contrary wise, plead a cause, join himself to, fugytyve. The form state is set apart for conditio; estate was needed to express other ideas. In p. 63 a clerk is wise in his own conceyte; we now make a difference between this noun and conception. The verb mervel was coming in fast, as we see in this treatise. In p. 106 a man is so amazed that he is absent to himself. In p. 93 a man is prevent by mercy, to repent before death; here the idea of forestalling begins to come in. The very, standing for valdè, is in great use.

About 1470 were compiled the 'Babees' Book' (Early English Text Society) and some other poems in the same volume. The chief author here is John Russell, some time servant to the good Duke Humphrey. He uses the y prefixed to the Past Participle, the ande which ends the Present Participle, and uche (quisque). He prefixes the y, as in yerb (herba); we see the alliterative ryme or reson in p. 199; the h is clipped; hræcan becomes reche (vomit).

Among the new Substantives are wrapper, slipper, runner (strainer). In p. 1 babees is used for young lads, reminding us of Baby Charles. In p. 195 Russell uses in my dayes, Mallory's phrase for olim. We see a new Adjective formed by adding som to an old one, as verysom, p. 168. There is the new phrase any further, p. 161.

Among the Verbs are set abroche (a pipe), set on egge (edge). In p. 3 the greeting prescribed is God spede. A new idiom with the Imperative is often used, be tastynge, p. 128; Coverdale was to be fond of this.

There is the Scandinavian substantive roughe (roe of fish), p. 154, also squirt.

Among the French words are posset, junket, Muscadel, sugar candy, basshe (modest, p. 161), courtly, vycount. The lees of some red wine are called coloure de rose, p. 125. The expletive sans doute is used. We hear of these gromes called wayters, who set out the table of Edward IV., p. 314, Note. The word mess gains a new meaning in p. 188; it does not mean food, but a party of men eating together. In p. 8 report stands for a written document. We see to brush clothes; the foreign word had also given birth to the Participle unbrushen. We read of the blod royal, one of the few instances where we still make the Adjective the last word.

The Middle class seem to have been making way about this time, for in p. 187 it is stated that merchants and rich artificers may sit at table with ladies and squires.

No one under the rank of an Earl employed a taster as a preservative against poison, p. 196. The Abbot of Tintern is named in p. 192 as the poorest of all the Abbots, he of Westminster being the highest; in the same way, the Prior of Dudley is opposed to the Prior of Canterbury.

In the 'Chronicles of the White Rose' (published in 1845) there are many documents of 1470 and 1471. We see avant cut down to van, p. 80, and discourour becomes scourer (scout), p. 75, as in the North. There are the verbs set in array, it lies in his power, keep terms with; this last reminds us of kepan half dale with, in 1210. The verb get, following the example of come, takes an Infinitive; he might get to have the overhand, p. 52. We hear of "so able and so well picked men," p. 45. There is an inversion in truth it is that, p. 234. We see the new adverb hourly, p. 235; there is terseness in the phrase they dispersed the soonest they could, p. 92. The Romance words are, the appointment is broken, abuse (fallere), his funeral service, tranquillity, to minister justice. In p. 57 we hear of comfortable (cheering) messages, where the able, as in the old defensible, has an Active sense. In p. 233 we have put it in ure (practice); hence came the verb inure twenty years later; still more remarkable is put them in their uttermost devoir to, p. 240; the change from the sense of debere to that of conari is most strange; a few years later Caxton wrote indevor him to, etc.

In the 'Political Songs' of the year 1471 (Master of the Rolls) the Northern change, which substituted aro (sagitta) for the Southern arwe, is making progress; in p. 277 waloing stands for the Participle of the old walewen. The old cloper is now written clothyer, p. 285. The form Bewme, not Beeme (Bohemia), appears, p. 284; perhaps this was an imitation of the German sound of the word. The French words are penowry (penury), altratyd (altered).

Warkworth's Chronicle (Camden Society) seems to belong to this time; the writer must have been an East Angle from his use of qwiche (which) and till (ad). Some documents of the time are added to the Chronicle. The old on lesse becomes our common unless, p. 50. We know the old idiom, a man of his; this is extended in p. 16, a manne of the Erles. Among the Substantives we see once more hande-gonnes, as distinguished from cannon; Edward IV. owed the recovery of his throne mainly to three hundred of these light weapons, borne by Flemings, p. 13. An adverb is made a noun; for in p. 17 stands the forwarde (of the battle). The new thoos (illi) may be read in a State paper, p. 46; it was soon to drive out the old tho. There is halff so myche more, p. 3, four of klokke, p. 16, not far from our phrase. Among the Verbs are give knoleage to, to loose gonnes at (our let off), lose it to the King, to turn out (come forth), make out commaunderments to, also commissions to. We see the cry wherewith a favourite chief was hailed: A! Kynge Herry, p. 14; this had come South since Wyn-toun's time.

Among the Romance words we find the new put them in devir to, etc.; there is pety capitaine, resist, execute him, levy war; the word dyverse is used without any substantive, p. 27, like the Latin Plural quidam, a new sense of the word; dyverse of them were turned. The word inconvenience stands for damnum, p. 37; debate is now used of a Parliamentary contest, p. 60; York's change of the succession was debatet. The Western shires are expressed by the west countre, p. 17. An old French proverb comes in p. 27, "a castelle that spekythe, and a womane that wille here, thei wille be gotene bothe."

In 'Halliwell's Original Letters of English Kings,' for the year 1473, we see the new substantive breakfast, p. 138, stamped with the authority of Edward IV.; also behaviour, p. 141, the ending of which seems to have been suggested by the word haver or havour (opes), coming from the French avoir. The word humanity stands here for "polite learning."

In the 'State Papers,' vol. vi., dating from 1473, we see "letters sent in that byhalf," p. 1; a new phrase for object. In p. 6 stands a minuit (minute) of a letter. In p. 8 we find the premisses (what has gone before).

London had been extending her sway over the shires South of Trent for the last Century as regards language; her influence can be measured by glancing at the Staffordshire poem in Horstmann's 'Altenglische Legenden,' p. 308, supposed to have been compiled about 1460. Chaucer, Wicliffe, and Henry the Fifth had not written in vain, but something still remained to be done; the old manuscripts were now to yield to a new invention.

CHAPTER III.

HITHERTO the New Standard English had been militant ; it was now at last triumphant ; the many dialects, at least to the South of Trent, very seldom reappear in writing after 1474. Caxton's press marks the beginning of a new period ; it arrested the decay of old Teutonic words, and gave stability to our spelling. The Reformation was to bring Standard English home to all men ; the Bible of Tyndale and Coverdale, and the Prayer Book of the reformed Anglican Church—books read every week in every English parish—were to insure the triumph of the East Midland English that had forced its way to London and Oxford. The form, in which the world-renowned English classics were soon to appear, now comes before us ; it differs in some points widely from Pecock's works that were compiled only a score of years earlier.

Caxton, a Kentish man, whose grandfather must have been born not long after the time that the Ayenbite of Inwit was compiled, lived for three years in London ; and then about 1441 betook himself to the Low Countries, where he combined trade and authorship. We might have expected, from his birth and breeding, that he would have held fast to the old Southern forms and inflections, at least as much as Bishop Pecock had done. But Caxton had come under another influence. In 1469 he had begun translating into English the 'Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye ;' in the previous year King Edward's sister had been given to Charles the Bold. The new Duchess took an interest in the work of her countryman, who had sickened of his task after writing five or six quires. In 1471, "she commanded me," says Caxton, "to show the said five or six quires to her said grace. And when she had seen them, anon she found defaute in mine English, which she commanded me to amend." She bade him (he had a yearly fee from her) go on with his book; and this work, the first ever printed in our tongue, came out in 1474. It was "not written with pen and ink, as other books are, to the end that every man may have them at once." Wherein did the Duchess and the Printer differ in their views of English? In this, that the one came of a Northern house, while the other had been born and bred in the South.¹ Owing to the new influence, in Caxton's first work we see the loss of the old Southern inflexions of the Verb; and we find Orrmin's their, them, and that (iste) well established, instead of the Southern her, hem, and thilk, beloved of Pecoock. Caxton uses business for occupation, and has the phrase to passe the tyme, whence a noun was to come, thirty years later. When we weigh the works of Caxton, who wrote under the eye of the Yorkist Princess, we should bear in mind the English written by her father in 1452, not very unlike the State papers of Henry V.² The Midland speech was now carrying all before it. The Acts of Parliament, passed under the last Plantagenet King, were soon to be printed by the old servant of the House of York.

Caxton says of himself, "I was born and lerned myn englissch in Kent in the weeld, where I dowte not is spoken as brode and rude englissch as is in ony place of englond."³ He got the 'Recuyell' printed at Bruges by his friend Colard Mansion in 1474; another of his works, the 'Game of the Chesse,' was printed by the same friend in the next year. In 1476 Caxton seems to have set up a press of his own in Westminster, where he worked till his death in 1491. Good reason has England to be proud of this son of hers, who opens a new era in her literature.

The 'Game of the Chesse' (I use Axon's reprint in 1883) abounds in new French words, which did not take root in England; there are very few Teutonic words, now obsolete, to be found there. Here we doubtless trace the influence of Caxton's fair patroness. Colard Mansion, a foreigner, had no type for the English þ; hence th usually replaces it, and our loss of the old character is accounted for. The letter y is sometimes used for it, as y^u (thou), y^t (that); hence we often see in our time y^e written for the; this last may be seen in p. 133. Another token of foreign influence is the Flemish gh before e, as ghest (hospes); ghost appears in later works.³ The Northern syn (quoniam) is preferred to the Southern sithen, p. 44. We see ner (neque) an odd mixture of the old ne with the North-Western corruption nor.

Caxton is fond of striking out vowels; he constantly prints forms like thanswer for the answer, a usage which lasted for a hundred years; captayn replaces Chaucer's capitaine; pawne (the chess piece) is written for Lydgate's poun. The o replaces ow; soroful is written for sorweful. The ch replaces t, as scracch; we see not reckless but recheless, which comes into our Prayer Book. Caxton is fond of the z, writing Cezar. Among his new Substantives are husband man, grauntsirs fader; this last was to be altered by 1530. The forms heyghte and hyghnes stand in one sentence, p. 159. The word rodde is used for a carter's whip, p. 76. Caxton is fond of new Plurals; thus he talks of heetes (ardores), p. 103, applying the word to the mind. The word forfex is now Englished by a pair of sheres, p. 93. Among his Adjectives is the hye sea; men may dress in whyte, p. 36. Among the Pronouns we see thee needlessly inserted, as ne doute the (fear not), p.

21 ; we have already seen I fear me. The her, now and then, still stands for illorum ; there is the very Northern phrase a frende of heeris (hers), p. 32. The nothing is very often used for not, the old nought ; no thynge so grete as, nothingse lyke to it. Caxton's countryman Shoreham had used nothing loud. There is the new phrase in p. 67, answer none otherwyse, where in is dropped. Caxton was unable to pass the Double Negative on to Tyndale, a generation later. An English sentence may now consist of two words ; in p. 87 the question is asked, who entendeth to, etc. ? Then comes Certainly none ; this we must owe to the French. We see the new phrase they ben worst of alle other ; here the of expresses beyond ; or else the other is not needed.

Among the Verbs we see sette in enprinte, gyve thankyngis, kepe a promise. The verb break gets the new sense of domare ; his hors well broken, p. 43. In p. 59 certain advice is given, which they toke ; in our phrase take advice, the verb may mean either rogare or amplecti. In p. 72 Cæsar is ready to do for his soldiers (act in their behalf) ; hence landladies profess to do for their lodgers. The old cleave (findere) becomes intransitive in p. 152 ; it moreover begins to take a Weak Perfect.

Among the Adverbs are a fore tyme, cornerwyse ; this wise was to be much used in compounding. The old adverb clerelier becomes more clerely, p. 2 ; a change for the worse. In p. 65 a man acts for nothyng that (non quia) he mistrusted ; this was soon to become not that he mistrusted, where a for is dropped. In p. 90 stands the grettest synne that is ; here a there is dropped before the verb.

As to Prepositions, there is a new idiom connected with for in p. 90 ; it is an evil thing for a man to have suspencion ; laws hard for them to kepe, p. 54 ; here the for connects an Infinitive with the Adjective. A covetous man is not good for ony thynge, p. 109. In p. 121 money is holden and gaged upon something ; this is a new betting phrase, both as regards the verb hold and the preposition.

Among the Romance words are redoubted, to endoctrine, parole, clyent (at law), gauntelet, barbaryns (barbarians), dis- agreable, depose (as witness), trowell, abandon, net (purus), to confisc, clere seing, treangle, vailliant. Caxton does not care to alter the French forms and words in the book which he was Englishing, thus we see Senegue (Seneca), moyan (mean), to estudy, mysericorde, to enseygne (docere), esprised with her, fumee (smoke), tryste (mæstus). He often restores to a French word a sense that it had long lost in England, as defend (vetare), caitif (captivus). New French forms replace older ones, as renomée, loyalty, gardes (no longer wardeins), guarisshe (not warish, to heal). We see both the Latin tractate and the French traytee, meaning our treatise. We hear of strange birds that men call wultres (vultures), p. 10. The two Participles corrupt and corompid stand side by side in p. 37; they are formed from different parts of the Latin verb. The word pietous is in constant use for pitying. Caxton couples franc with free, p. 79; he also brought in new Plurals, as vilanyes (scelera). He uses marshal for smith, p. 85; this word must have been commoner in everyday speech than in literature, to account for our frequent surname Marshall. We hear of dyvnye pourveance, p. 113; we now usually give to the substantive its Latin form. The old estate makes way for another word; men in good condicion, p. 132; but it here refers to the mind, not the body. We are told in p. 158 that the myles of Lombardy and England are called in France leukes (leagues). The foreign verb extend was now driving out the Teutonic reach. The word succession now expresses proles, and is used of a king, p. 170. We saw, about the year 1470, the new phrase put them in dever to; this is now altered by Caxton into endeavor them to, p. 3; and a further change was to come thirty years later. Caxton is fond of using peple for homines; a queen should spring of (from) honest peple, p. 27; we now often use my people for my family. A manoir is used for castellum, p. 30; hence our Worksop Manor, referring to a house. Caxton's Southern birth is evident when he writes tumerous for timorous, p. 32. In p. 50 we see the new word botye (booty), and also its French form butyn. There is a favourite phrase set it a part (aside), that is, abolere. The verb close becomes intransitive, p. 90. The barbarous compound scavage (show-age) appears in p. 139 ; it here means toll taken upon goods displayed for sale ; hence shortly was to come scavenger. The Latin mulier is derived from mollis aer in p. 123 ; this was repeated by Shakespere.

The technical terms of Chess appear in this book, such as chesse borde, chesse meyne, chesse men, a quadrante (square), set the chesse, take his adversary, go from black to whyte, to meve (ire, not movere), to cover (your men).

In the 'Book of Curtesye,' printed about 1477, Caxton follows a manuscript that makes a few alterations in the text of 1450, upon which I have already remarked ; see p. 285 of my book. He preserves the old Imperative in eth. He couples the verbs mocken and mowe in p. 49 ; the first word was to be replaced by Shakespere's mop. The morowe (mane) and thilke of the first text are here altered into mor-enynge and these, pp. 5 and 43 ; and (si) is turned into yf, p. 9. A wonderful mistake is made in p. 47, where to goo louse is altered into go to the galowis.

In 1481 Caxton translated the hystorye of Reynard the Foze from the Dutch ; this is the most valuable treatise ever set in type by him, and it has been reprinted again and again ; I have gone to the Percy Society for my text. In this piece Caxton brought in many Dutch words, such as the verbs rutsele, wentle, etc. He prints diere (fera) in the Dutch way, not the English dere ; so also lupaerd and ungheluck. He says, "I have followed as nyghe as I can my copie, which was in dutche, and translated into this rude and symple Englyssh ;" here Dutch is restricted to Hollandish, I think for the first time. In this work, the diction of which is most unlike the 'Game of Chesse,' Caxton shows his Southern birth by printing axe (rogare), anhongryd, suster, everiche, tryew, the old treow (verus), and valdore as well as faldore, p. 34. But the Northern words and forms had come down in flocks, and were now embodied in Standard English. Where replaces there (ubi) in p. 121. Caxton has already (jam), halow (clamare), the Perfect thou dalf-est, gete (ire), sware, upsodown, she-ape, ranne (cucurrit), cratch (scratch), have the overhand of, kyndenes (benignitas), ill life, have done. The Danish whatsomever and such like forms are found. Caxton's great claim upon us is that in many words he gave us back the old hard East Anglian g, which for the foregoing 300 years had been commonly softened into y in words like gate, get, again; he even writes gulp instead of yelp. In p. 73 comes to day by the morow; Gualtier, the later editor of 1550, turned this last word into morning. The Northern has begins to replace the Southern hath, p. 31. The old Gloucestershire kyen (vaccæ) was made a Standard word by Caxton. Nothing shows more plainly the influence of the Dano-Anglian forms than that he should write ridge (dorsum), the old hrycg; here he prefers the Northern i to the usual Southern u (rugge), or to his own Kentish e (regge).

We find many old proverbs here; among others, a pot may goo so longe to water, that at the last it cometh to-broken hoom; I am no byrde to be locked ne take by chaf.

As to Vowels, there are herke, hearke, and harkene, all three; we have seen the old estatlich; the first vowel of this is clipped in p. 48; jeopardy and manace become jepardye and menace. It was now settled that we should write peyne, not pine. The king is addressed as me lorde, p. 78. We find our form bier (feretrum), p. 8, where the ie is new. Caxton writes gylty and not the usual Southern gulty. The old swelwen now becomes swolow, p. 83; the Northern bile (pustula) here is seen as bule, which is also a Flemish word; this shows how our boil was once sounded. The o and u still interchange, for both rome and ruym (p. 81) appear. Caxton was fond of turning the old prefix bi into be, as bely for the old bileozen (falsely accuse).

As to Consonants, he is fond of the gh; he has syghe for the old sike, used by Chaucer. The d is inserted in hedche, p. 103, as before in the 'Promptorium.' The z, an unusual letter, replaces s in wexel, p. 157, which had been written wesile in the 'Promptorium.'

Turning to the Substantives we see the double forms neve and neveu, Bruin and Browning. The racke (not long known in England) is mentioned in p. 29, and this is spelt ratte in p. 12; just as we have backe (vespertilio) in p. 109.

We see the common phrase a deel of hem in p. 18, where great should follow the article. A man is said to be a Friese (Frisian), p. 55. We hear of the bear's ridge (back), p. 58; burgh stands for burrow in p. 80. Quene is here used as a synonym both for a Monarch and a wench; the old chorle stands for nothing higher than a clown, p. 133, and is opposed to Lord, p. 49. Reynard eats his bely-ful, p. 139. We find in this book good luck, brome (for sweeping), sorenes. In p. 140 nyckers is used for fiends; this Scandinavian word may have given birth to Butler's Old Nick. There is shadde (our shed), which seems to come from our word for umbra; there is the true old Kentish inwytte (conscience), p. 93.

Among the Adjectives is shrewessh, p. 28. In p. 86 we read of loos prelates; that is, lege soluti, a new sense of the adjective. We find rude and plompe beestis, p. 140; here the plompe means rusticus; the sense of pinguis was to come later.

As to Pronouns, we may remark that the King, when angry, uses thou to his subjects, pp. 38, 46; when in a gracious mood, as in pp. 22, 23, he uses ye to each animal. The Queen, when eager to know a secret, uses the flattering ye to Reynard, though he is at the moment a criminal on his way to the gallows. The ram, p. 68, is addressed as ye your self. We also find fyrve of us, p. 97; one who was your better and wyser, p. 140, a very Old English form; also, that one, that other, p. 150. Caxton is fond of as who saith. In p. 77 stands he sayd not a trewe worde; here we should substitute one for the a; Caxton here had probably the old Southern o in his mind.

On turning to Verbs we are struck by the frequent repetition of the solemn should (answering to must), where we use the lighter would. In p. 126 the old gecomen, icomen, becomes a-comen, just as it is now pronounced in the West. In p. 160 stands "they wold not of his felawship;" here we should now set have none for not. There are verbs like bespatter (something like bispitten), Piers Ploughman's galp (yelp), unsho, maw (the cry of a cat), dasel (dazzle) from dase. There are phrases like it goth to my herte; I goo in drede; saye ony good of hym; smell sweet. We now often hear the phrase not if I know it; this may be found in p. 55 without the first word. In the same page may be seen here ye; our insolent d'ye hear? In p. 85 stands slepe your dyner; we should now put off after the verb. The growl is often used, but only as an Impersonal verb; the old grillan in its Southern form; hym myght growle that, etc., p. 108; our present use of the verb came about 1700. To smeke is used as a synonym for flatter, p. 126; this may have had its influence on our later smug. Layamon's marke, found here in p. 134, is a weightier word than its synonym see. Two phrases afterwards inserted in the Bible appear, skrab (scratch) and come to passe, p. 151. Look aboute you is a synonym for "to be wary."

Among the Adverbs are heirtofore, p. 57; in p. 107 stands go to fore; we now insert the before the last word, and make it a noun. The fox, we are told, might better (be) of and on, p. 150; our on and off is now mostly applied to love affairs. How wel stands in p. 49, where Skelton, a few years later, wrote however well; and do so wel as to, etc., stands in p. 51 for our be so good as to. In p. 55 comes XII yer agoon; Caxton thinks that the a is a separate word and disjoins it from the goon; in the North this phrase would have been replaced by sinnes. In p. 122 a bone sticks thwart; this is the old overthwart, our athwart. The outright (omnino) of 1300 is clipped; hear me all out.

Among the Prepositions we find hurt unto the death, I know myself for one, p. 108; hence "I for one;" half fro myself, p. 92; that is, out of my wits; like our "he is from home;" the fayrest of theyr age, p. 138. The Interjections are Oho and Ach.

Among the French words are to plaghe (plague), deux aas, p. 62, clere hym, lycensyd in law, p. 84.¹ Awreke and avenge this is in p. 75; the old and new verbs stand side by side. Place is now evidently ousting the old stede. We hear of riche curates, p. 87 ; the epithet in our days seems strange, until we remember what was the old term for parish priest. The verb bray is used for the noise of both a bear and a bull. Ummerciful is in p. 48 ; this is the same kind of formation as Ælfric's undeclinigendlice.

In 1482 Caxton printed Trevisa's Chronicle, which was then all but a Century old. The variations in the language show us the changes that had been at work, unchecked by any counteracting influence ; the printing press had been unknown in England until 1474. The letter ȝ (for y) is clean gone, and þ is hardly ever used for th ; this þ which was now vanishing is a sad loss. Henceforth the language was to be much more stable ; a hundred years later still Sir Philip Sidney would have altered but few of Caxton's words. I give a specimen of the changes in English—

Caxton brought out an edition of Chaucer's 'House of Fame' in 1483 ; we can thus mark further changes in our speech. The printer replaces gost by his new Dutch ghost. The old Imperative haveth (habete) makes way for have ye, do (factum) becomes don, y-be appears as be ; (it) nas but, etc., as (it) was but, arne (sunt) as ar, nyste I as I ne wylst, wilnen as wylleth, hevenyssh as heavenly, graunt mercy as gramercy, other as eyther, disesperat as desperate, disport as sporte, mochil as grete. Chaucer had written Cataloigne and Aragon ; but in Caxton's time another part of the Peninsula had taken the lead ; he therefore writes Castyle lyon (Leon) and Aragon, p. 215. Even Thynne in 1532 often sticks closer to the old text than Caxton does. The latter thus speaks of Chaucer, "In alle hys werkys he excellyth in myn oppynyon alle other wryters in our Englyssh. For he wrytteth no voyde wordes, but alle hys mater is ful of hye and quycke sentence. . . . Of hym alle other have borowed syth and taken in alle theyr wel sayeng and wrytyng." Few poets, in modern times, have enjoyed 500 years of continuous honour.

In Caxton's edition of the 'Book of the Knight of La Tour Landry' (Early English Text Society), given to the world in 1483, there is the Southern form suster, the Northern ask and the which, also some body, p. 176, and straw (sternere) to be afterwards used by Tyndale ; the old assay becomes essay, p. 170 ; both dommage and dammage stand in p. 194. In p. 175 stands the pleonasm one onely word. In p. 179 stands better men of theyr persones ; hence the later "a tall man of his hands." In p. 194 we find not above ten yere old ; here this preposition is first prefixed to numerals. In p. 200 stands at all aventure (in any case) ; this paved the way for our "at all events." French words are brought in from the original without the slightest reason, as arrache, vergoynous ; there is custommed to doo (solitus), p. 195.

Dr. Murray's Dictionary shows that Caxton prefixed the a to the old knouleche (fateor) ; he has also amuse (fallere), absolutely (certainly), and by accident.

In the 'York Wills' for 1482 and 1483 we see a thoroughly Northern substitution, when a Saville writes his own name as Sayvell, iii. 294. In p. 287 an executor, speaking of a servant, calls hym to accomptes; we now put the last word in the Singular.

In Rymer's documents, from 1474 to 1477, we see the form buye (emere) in a grant of Edward the Fourth's, p. 185; the word has at last all but taken its modern form. In p. 175 we once more see the Present and Future coupled in the nobles being and to be under him. This was also an idiom of Caxton's. The word Duchery, p. 826, occurring in a Scotch document, is a compromise between duchy and dukery; the latter word is well known in Notts. We see non, as before, prefixed to a Teutonic word; in non-doing of (it), p. 838. In p. 849 stands the expedition and setting forth of the army; here both the Romance and the Teutonic nouns convey a transitive sense, though we now use them as neuters. There is a Scotch substitution of bringage for bringing in the year 1477. There is the new placquant (placard).

In the 'Rolls of Parliament,' 1474-1483, we see the Old and New forms coupled in p. 166, where mention is made of the village Iwarne Courteney, otherwise Yewarne Courteney; both Janyver and January appear. In p. 113 we read of the Northrithyng and Estrithyng of York; this th had not yet been corrupted into d in the East Anglian fashion; in the same way the old verb aforthel lingers in p. 156, followed by an Infinite. There is the surname Gibbes, due to Gilbert; and new nouns like oversight, neernesse, mys-behavyngs; the latter shows how readily the mis was prefixed to a new word. In p. 188 various plays are mentioned, among them are half bowle, handyn and handowte; these, like our skittles, were played in gardens. In p. 134 we read of 12 fathom; the word is unchanged in its Plural form. The Commons are addressed as youre wisdomes, p. 182. In p. 221 we see that grilles was anything but equal to a salmon. In p. 156 we learn that Englishmen were getting fonder of playing cards than of archery; a statute is passed (like one of the Emperor Frederick the Second's), compelling every ship to bring home bowstaves from foreign parts. In p. 193 stands it is comen to his knowlage.

The preposition out (we saw one instance in Chaucer) was now beginning to encroach upon over in composition; to outleve him stands in p. 234, where the out expresses super, not ex. Among the Romance words are sewers (of water), p. 210, demeane (domain), to quiet them, arable land. We saw determine (statuere) in Trevisa; we now find in p. 241 we be determined to, etc. In p. 210 we hear of the Priour and his confreres; the latter word is now a thing of beauty and joy to our penny-a-liners. The old French form bordure still stands, not having given way to border.

The 'Paston Letters,' from 1474 to 1485, show many changes at work. There is the East Anglian plot (of ground), huswifery; thos (illi) is much used for tho by the upper class. The sound of the French ê is making its way to the South, for there are declair, gayt (I gat, got), p. 227; in p. 254 stands Leystoft for Lowestoft, owing most likely to the twofold sound of oi. The o replaces ow in boroed. In p. 140 we have streightly charge theym; here the Teutonic gh is thrust into a French word. A Paston uses the very Southern form "(it) ys do" (done) in p. 247; this do was very near sharing the triumph of ago (agone). The most curious use of consonants is that of psal for sal (shall), p. 221. The r is inserted, for the quavin of the 'Promptorium' now becomes qwaiver, p. 174.

Among the new Substantives are shomaker, wardship, the lete (let of an estate), your moderchypp (mothership). In p. 109 a letter is directed to a knight, "lodgyd at the George by Powlys Wharff;" here we see the titles of Saints clipped in common usage. The word towardnes before the Conquest had meant futurity; this had died out, and the substantive, bearing another meaning, is coined anew from the adjective toward; see p. 122. The word stok had expressed progenies in Wickliffe; it stands for domus in p. 190, and for pecus in p. 238. In p. 133 we hear of a grome of the chambyr. In p. 170 a young lady addresses her betrothed as her Voluntaryne. In p. 148 a new title comes up; Sir John Paston talks of Mother Brown; in p. 171 reference is made to my lady my moder. It is hoped, in p. 163, that a marriageable girl may come into Crysten menyys handys; here Crysten must stand for a man of worth. In p. 155 something is gotten by stronge hand (violence). In p. 162 the conquerors of Charles the Bold appear as the Suechys; Tyndale later called them Souchenars. We have already seen your wisdoms; in p. 181 we have your wurshippys. There is the new word groundage, p. 211, expressing the right to what comes aground after a wreck at sea. The old ferre was now being replaced in composition by fellow; in p. 235 stands bedffelaue. In p. 244 there is not only Chaucer's brue hous, but also the new bruewyf. We find Tully for Cicero in p. 301, just as July had replaced Julius nearly 200 years earlier. We see the proper name Whyte in p. 211.

Among the Adjectives something is called in p. 239 not goodely nether goddely; the latter word starts once more to life after a long sleep. In p. 144 we hear of a gravecloth not worth II^d, a phrase that we still keep, sometimes adding to it halfpenny. The word onhappy is applied to a thing without feeling in p. 121, much as unlucky. The word slak is employed in a new sense in p. 166, slakke payeres. The Past Participle of hreddan (liberare) had not often been used hitherto; she wold be redde of it, p. 295. We read of a free horse in p. 200; this must mean generosus; we now talk of "a free goer."

Among the Pronouns we see on (one) weye or other, p. 153.

As to the Verbs, there is a most unusual coupling in p. 159, I wyll and shall be redy. The Imperative stands for the Future in p. 211, lesse (lose) your ryht now and lesse it for ever. We see do the best I can, p. 143; lay to me (a charge), let loose, it is well ment, brynge it to effecte, I took (visited) him in my wey, put in possessyon, make trobyll, fall in qweyntaince with, gete it into your handes, draw ought (up) a bylle, kepe possession, doo as moche for yow. We have seen mean applied to the signification of a word; it is now applied to the reality denoted by the word, they wote what yt meneth to be as a sauger, p. 135. The verb crase is still used both of sea-sickness and of illness produced by bad diet in p. 161; we now confine it to failure of brain. In p. 149 deele stands for make a bargain. In p. 188 yowr mater is blowyn wyde, "made common talk;" hence character is blown upon. Our slang use of sit upon is foreshadowed in p. 235; the King intends to sitte upon a criminal; that is, in judgment. In p. 231 stands ye may do meche with the Kyng; here the do represents the old dugan (valere), not don. The Infinitive is dropped after have (jubeo), how ye wyll have me demeanyd, p. 159. The verb spring is made transitive in p. 130, iff (it) sprynge (produce) any sylver; a new verb is coined in p. 162, where the Swiss berde the Duke of Burgoyne. We see the Chaucerian I gesse used as an expletive in the American way, p. 185. The Passive Voice is further developed, I am promysed to know, p. 228. The verb do is even at this late date used for our make, do him come, p. 238. The phrase go to lawe, p. 245, means simply "begin to study law."

As to Adverbs, down is employed in a new sense in p. 226, the wod (wood) is down; out is prefixed to nouns; we hear of the owt chargys, that is, extra charges, p. 126. In p. 194 stands the soner the better. There is a new phrase for tolerare in p. 199, used afterwards in the Bible, my charges be gretter than I maye a weye with; perhaps a verb make is dropped before the a weye, representing some sense like facere viam; the whole construction is most curious. Old Margaret Paston uses there in its old sense, ubi, in p. 284; she speaks of Redham, there as I was borne.

Among the Prepositions we find be in hand with a man, it is in the gift of, etc., be in goode hope, be out of facyon; here the last word takes the sense of mode. Hitherto a man had appeared before the Lords of the Council; now a mater is beffoor them, p. 153. A well-known law phrase is in p. 166, ye sholde have it with your wyffe to the lenger lyver of yow bothe. In p. 219 stands, (she) is upon L yer of age; here close is dropped after is. In p. 204 we see long of comyng where the of must stand for an on. Instead of saying "she has a sister," a lad writes in p. 241 ther be II systers of them; our "make a night of it" is something like this.

stroke, p. 169. If a thing is very easy to be obtained, a goose may get it, p. 163.

The well-known letter of young Master Paston from Eton, anent love-making and Latin verse-making, stands in p. 240 ; it was written in 1479.

There is the Dutch word waynescotte.

The Romance words are specify, plunge (as a frisky horse does), relyffe (relief), rental, weell-monyed, prefyxr, compleynaunt, senior (set after a proper name), ipse dixit, seyetyka (sciatica), a gradwat (graduate), marye with yowe (filiam tibi dare, p. 168), pylyon (on a horse), my quarter wagys, sertyfy, suppliant. Dame Margaret Paston repeatedly addresses another lady as Madam, p. 197 ; she talks of a somma of money and summa totalis, p. 135. There is the phrase have a horse with him at lyvery, iii. 280. We see the two meanings that may be borne by one verb in p. 141, ye shall not depart tyll dethe depart yow. We read of good dysposyn (disposition), and of a person being dysposyd to act, p. 201. In p. 148 stands please it yow to sende, etc. ; we should now strike out the three middle words. The young Etonian is the first Englishman, I think, to use one of our commonest phrases, the French translation of the Northern even ; she is just weddyd, p. 241 ; this refers to time, but Pecoock's even so was to become just so. The verb desire gets the new meaning of jubeo, p. 256. In p. 300 we read of a boke in preente, which is something new ; this refers to the first book ever printed in England. There is a curious mixture of Latin and French forms in proveyd (purveyed) of, p. 211. We see the verbs to meve and to mocyon in one sentence, p. 158 ; another verb, coined from a noun, is to laches (neglect), p. 216. The old no fors was making way for a longer-lived phrase, taken up by Tyndale rather later ; it makyth no matyr how corse it be is in p. 237.

In the 'Plumpton Letters' (1474-1485) we see the sound of our common do in dow (facere), p. 42 ; the r is cast out in Knasboro, p. 32 ; the old begotten is seen as gotten, p. xciii. In p. 33 we read of a watche word, which here means a caution. The Southern reve (gerefa) appears more correctly in Yorksire as grave, p. 39 ; another form grieve is still in being. I have remarked upon monger in composition; in p. 30 we hear of a supersedeas mounger. We see the source of drive a bargain, when a man says of an article, in p. 37, "I have cheaped (it) . . . and that is the least that I can drive it to."

Among the French words are moyte (half), to file (papers). Orrmin's Pasch is still in Northern use for Easter. We read of parson Tuly, p. 31, a familiar way of mentioning a priest; Robin becomes Robenett in p. 38.

There are some other Northern documents (1477-1485) in Davies' 'York Records.' We see the old gude, bryg (pons), tochand, we gretys, eyn (vesper). Some of these forms, evidently the work of a Yorkshire clerk, are contained in a letter signed by the future Richard III., p. 147. So fond were the Northern men of changing a into el, that we find here pairt, depairt, airms. The old sawel, where the first syllable answers to the French ou, is now changed into sall, p. 142; and this remains in Scotch use. There is the proper name Nelson, p. 183; we read of wards (of a city) and wapentaks. A pageant is called a syght, p. 162; the lokkes of a river are mentioned in p. 84. Men are made toll free, p. 144; a new instance of compounding with an adjective. In p. 178 news comes that Buckingham is turnyd ayanst Richard III.; bear the charges of, etc., is in p. 115; find things upon him is in p. 200. The Romance words are almyfluent, jacket, javelin, usefullnes (profit).

In the 'Testamenta Eboracensia,' iii., we see shaft for sagitta, p. 253; beriall loses the sense of sepulchrum and means sepultura, p. 244; there is the phrase woman of livelod (property), p. 257; a man of wealth and rank is yoman of the chambre to the King, p. 294. There is the phrase break ground, used literally. There is the compound gardenshipp (of a child), p. 241.

We have the Statutes of an Exeter Guild ('English Gilds,' Early English Text Society, p. 304), drawn up in the year 1480. The y is prefixed to Past Participles, as y-occupied; but it hardly ever appears after this time. We see the Salopian won (unus), p. 323, and wothe, p. 316; the Northern whatsomever, p. 318; fang (recipere) is found, which remains to our own day in Devonshire mouths. There is a habit of prefixing y to vowels, as yand for and; soul (anima) is written sole, just as we pronounce it, p. 318; in p. 314 are the two forms sower and sewer (stitcher). There is a curious change of i into oy; the old spillan (lædere) becomes spoyll, p. 321; the Teutonic verb was thus confused with the French corruption of spoliare. The g and d are still confused, as acordynd to, p. 336; a very late instance. There is the new substantive foreman; one of the old senses of free comes out in p. 316, free of the craft.¹ Among the Verbs is call him a mysname; here we now dock the mys. As to new French words, we read of the customers of a shop, p. 317; and quarter dayys.

In p. 413 of the same work we find a Bristol document; very few old turns of phrase remain, except tho, beth, ycome, "our alther (omnium) liege lord," p. 415.

In Gardner's 'Letters of Richard III.' (Master of the Rolls) there is a curious insertion of ps in anempst, p. 23, the Scotch anent. In pp. 6 and 7 morne and moro are at last distinguished and are employed in our sense of the words. The form thoos (illi) was now rapidly driving out the rightful tho; the former is used by Richard III., p. 51. We see fore-horse, bear love towards, I here for certeyne, havyng respecte to, frountures (frontiers). These are in 1483.

William of Worcester, known also as Botoner, penned his observations upon English geography and history in 1480, paying particular heed to his native Bristol; his 'Itinerarium' was reprinted in 1778. What was Aldgate in London had been corrupted into Oldgate at Bristol, p. 182. The ala of a Church is seen as yle in p. 79, and as isle in p. 82; whence comes aisle; the confusion between ala and insula is curious. We see Chedsey, p. 144, the Chedzoy of Lord Macaulay. We read of Botrouse Castle, near Tyntagel, p. 123; this is a corruption of Botreaux (Botriouse); so the village of Wickham Breaux, near Canterbury, is now pronounced Broo. William shows his Southern breeding by talking of vethym instead of fathom. The d is struck out; there are both the forms St. Audoen and St. Ewen (applied to one Bristol church), pp. 221 and 215.

Among the Substantives are seebord, ward (of a castle), wildfire, crossway. The word kenning is applied to a view reaching over twenty-one miles out at sea, p. 110; hence our "within ken." The unusual word le slip is explained in p. 218, anglicè a steyre. There is a nickname in p. 324; a man who has no hands is called Thomas Stompys (stumps). A famous town on the Dee, which had long lain waste, appears as West-chestre, p. 263. The old firren mast now appears as mast de vyrrre, p. 175. Names of places keep their old forms more exactly than other words; we see the old Genitive Plural in Monken-brygge and Hounden-lane; dyke (fossa) has not become ditch, p. 217.

There is the Celtic noun gull, for a bird, p. 111. Among the Romance words are text-wryter, custom-hous, cylyng (ceiling), casement, reredes (reredos), a gargyle, crosse-gle. We see the ovyrstoye of a building in p. 82; this noun coming from estorer (instaurare) is confused with historia, for le ovyrhistorie stands in p. 78. We see panyes of glass in p. 93, which appear also as panellæ, p. 82; we now distinguish between a pane and a panel (pannus), each meaning a portion of something. In p. 117 we read of le pleyrn de Salysbery. In an heraldic description in p. 164 we light on ung egle displayed de argent, the spread eagle of later times; it was heraldry, no doubt, that caused the French eagle to drive out the English ern; we see how the verb display took root. In p. 169 we read of lez shamlys (shambles), from the Latin scamnum, scamellum. Soon after 1240 the great trench or quay to the North of Bristol had been dug; this in 1480 still retained its old name le graunt key, p. 255. Other traces of the Norman Conquest and its results on the burgher class are seen; in p. 243 the place of justice is called anglice lez fourches sive galowes; the Old Market stood on the East side of the town, and this is also called le veyle market, p. 211. Our author translates compassion by pietas, p. 271. We see filius naturalis in p. 340, a phrase which could not take root in English for more than a Century. The parish authorities were as heedless in those days as now; the South aisle of All Saints was built in this Century, when the bones and freestone tomb of our author's uncle, who died about 1420, were removed; see p. 171.

In Ellis' Letters for 1483 we see Collouagne written instead of the usual Coleyne, owing to the twofold sound of oi. There are the phrases in myn opinion, charge upon their lives. In p. 168 stands the rekenyng to begyne, etc.; here being, which should be the third word, is dropped.

The 'Chronicles of the White Rose' were compiled about 1483. How utterly lost the Old English grammar was may be seen by the fact that the Commons begin a petition with pleaseth (placeat) it your Grace, p. 272. There is the phrase twenty persons of gentlemen, p. 114. We learn that the three most Royal houses of Christendom in 1483 were reckoned to be England, France, and Spain, p. 276. A curious mixture of official language in this year is seen in p. 279; a bill in English is read before Richard III.; then comes A ceste bille les Communs sont assentes; then the King's assent is set down in Latin, p. 279. The Romance words in these Chronicles are profane (secular), edition (publication); the policy of England is in p. 277 coupled with her laws and liberties, and must therefore mean here political interest.

In 1483 was compiled the 'Catholicon Anglicum' (Early English Text Society), an English-Latin dictionary; it seems to be due to the North-East of Yorkshire. Among the Northern forms and phrases, now unknown in the South, are hundreth (centum), lyke sange (nœnia; who forgets Monkbarns' lykewake?), neddyr (aspis), fee (pecus), seen in feehouse, smallum (minutim), stag (pullus), gudsyre (avus), forgetyll (obliviosus), girn (grin), towne (both pagus and villa), to uppehepe (cumulare); tomorne, as it still does in Yorkshire, stands for cras. The old kakel (used of a hen) is here seen as kaykylle. The old haga (hedge) is unsoftened in hag- worme; but beche, belch (the old belk), drone, show Southern forms creeping up to the North. In p. 190 we see a Latin verse, an aid to memory in declining domus—

This, in my schoolboy days, had become—

“Tolle me, mi, mu, mis, si declinare domus vis.”

The a replaces e, as in parcelle (parsley), harthe (focus). The final e is sometimes not pronounced; howe is written for the old hu; the ea replaces ia, as treakylle (treacle). The y is added; there is gramary, here meaning the same as gramere (grammar). The y supplants o; nyke is written for nokke (notch), as we saw in the ‘Ballads.’ We find chine written for chain, a Yorkshire usage seen before. The old þawen (degelare) is here written thowe, a very different sound from what the verb now bears in the North; the old tawere (coriarius) becomes tewer, taking the favourite English sound.

As to Consonants, we see the true old form borgh (mutuum), and also the Southern corruption borowe (mutuari); we find also bower (arcuarius), whence comes a surname. The old g had long been softened in the Old English geolo (flavus), but it is hard as ever in the Northern gulle, seen here, from the Scandinavian gulr (flavus). There is the Scandinavian chafte, and also the English chavyll and chawylle (maxilla), whence jowl was to come. The b is inserted; there is schambylle as well as schamylle (whence shambles). The t is added; for parchemin becomes parchement. The n is struck out, spinder becomes spyder, p. 116. The r is inserted, as in hoarse, long before; a swathe of grass becomes a swarthe. The m is inserted, there are the two forms apostem and imposteme (imposthume). A change of meaning is shown by simply adding an s; there is both glosse (adulari) and glose (glosare). The l is added, for there are both the old pedder and the new pedlare; the latter form had come much earlier.

Among the new Substantives are cade (ovis domestica), dave (monedula), rokett (rochet), sappelynge, wagstert (our wagtail). There are the compounds, ake apylle, arowhede, banefyre (bonfire), bedtyme, blynde worme, fery man, fidylle stik, fleschour (carnifex, a Northern word), flesche schamylle (macellum), hay coke (the last part of the compound is Scandinavian), hartstringe, hedelande, lynsy wolsye, litilnes, mure cok, schepherde dog, snayballe (snowball), thonour bolte, toste yren. The old bow may now be used for the arch of a building, as the Netherbow at Edinburgh; we also read of the bryge of a nose. The word schafte may now be used of a pillar. The word folowynge may now express sequela. There is a new word merytotyr, the source of our "merry go round;" in Yorkshire merritrotter is still used for a kind of swing. What we now call a pore appears as a swet hole. The old eldfudyr (avus) is made to express abavus in p. 428. Two nouns are revived after a long sleep, scutelle (canistrum) and newness. We see Huchon for Hugh.

There are many Teutonic Adjectives ending in able, as biteable, clenseable, eteable, loveable, untellable, with several others. There is also ill fame, wyde opyn, wordy; an epithet that will always stick to the luckless Alison. One word out of all those compounded with the Teutonic sam (semi) lived beyond the year 1400; it here takes the form of sande blynde (luscus), and in this form it was used by Shakespeare. The open is made a substantive, as þe opyn of þe hede (calvaria). In p. 426 anniculus is Englished by a zere olde.

Among the new Verbs we see miselle (muzzle) coming from mist, whewe (fistulare). There are unbend, bryst up (burst up), crakk nuttes, wax even (vesperare), stryke fire, to halfe, hold halyday, putt out strength, schute (as corn does). The verb wirshipe adds to its old sense of colere that of adorare, as in the Monk of Evesham. The verb cross gets the new sense of cancellare; we say cross out. The verb grave here means not only sculperere but also fodere; this last sense has vanished before the Southern dig. We see scrud, with rub given for its synonym; hence perhaps our verb scrooge. There is a curious instance of a French ending tacked on to a Teutonic root, unwernyschit for unwearned.

The Adverb is placed before a Participle, as clene rynnynge; there is also hereaway (hac).

There is the Interjection schowe, p. 338.

The Scandinavian words are kylte (succingere), snep, kytylle (titillare). There is the Celtic bannok.

Among the Romance words are arsenic, brusket (brisket), case (theca), congruity, cowrbe (a curb), disfigure, halfe a cerkyll, to halfe tone, lavyr (lavacrum), legerdemayn, nowne, obstymate, to order, ospray, pasnepe (parsnip), pynappylle, sculzon, tendron (tendril), thre cornarde (triangulus). The word clokke supplants the old horiloge, and drops the sense of campana. There is pille garleke (vellicare), whence came a scornful term. We see the word hympsynger; we now talk of psalmsingers. The Latin in may be seen encroaching on the French en, as inquire, invyous. There is the curious substantive mawnchepresande (a munch present), equal to sicofanta; this looks like a literal version of one of Hesiod's Greek adjectives. The word pair is now used with the Genitive both of tongs and pincers. The noun robymett is employed for the redbreast. The old tretabyll (tractabilis) is still in use; but in tracte (sistema, tractus) the Latin, not the French form, is followed. We see both the Substantive forms trayn and trayle. There is goffe (godfather); this may have had its influence on gaffer; also gome (commère), whence perhaps gammer. There is sprynge (enervare); the Teutonic form is used for the French espreindre, our sprain.

We have already seen the 'Promptorium Parvulorum' of 1441; I now show, from later editions, dating from about this time, 1485, what alterations had been made in our tongue within little more than forty years. I have added to the second column one form taken from Caxton—

Make (Celtic)
Sewstare (sutrix)
Upholder (the tradesman)

1485.

lawnsset (lancet).

Maffeyth! (my faith).
Magot (maggot).
Soware.
Upholster (Caxton).

I may call attention to morwyn (mane) and morwynstere, old forms that lingered down to this time. The alteration of Adjectives into Past Participles in the above list will be remarked.

Of the 'Digby Mysteries' (Shakespeare Society) two pieces may be set down to 1490 or thereabouts; these are 'The Killing of the Children' and 'Mary Magdalene.' They seem to belong to East Anglia; there are xal, arn, the strait way of the 'Paston Letters,' and bigg (ædificare); also Lydgate's precyous knave. The form defyle comes very often. One of the greatest changes is, that wolde God becomes wold to God! p. 74; here the e being clearly pronounced was mistaken for to; Chaucer's I wish to God may have had some influence here. The old fader and moder now become fathyr and mother; the h in dohter was still sounded so clearly that it is written docctor in p. 88.

As to Substantives, in p. 123 stynt is employed for wages, something like pittance. The word harlot is applied to women in p. 14, I think, for the first time; this usage was established by Tyndale. Herod uses lang baynes (long bones) as a term of abuse, p. 61. In p. 128 the Virgin is called sokor for man and wyff, that is, for all mankind; hence "all the world and his wife." We see what is your wyll? a word with thee; also the name Maryon. Among the Adjectives are blabyr-lyppyd; a woman is addressed as my own dere, p. 75.

Among the Verbs is the Northern inbring. We find give audience, shew sport, fall flat to the ground, bring to abaye (bay). There is the Northern wyll we walk? p. 75. The have is wonderfully clipped in had natt a (have) byn ded, p. 88. A sailor is ordered to sett of from the land, p. 109; here the Accusative ship must be dropped, and we gained a new term for proficisci. The old phrase go a pilgrimage had long been in use; this is extended in p. 127, where a woman has gon þe stacyounes.

Among the Adverbs in p. 76 stands how I tremyl! the how had hitherto been coupled with an adjective or adverb. The so I shall of 1320, beginning the answer to another man's speech, is continued; we see so am I in pp. 7 and 96. A person is called and answers here, lord, here, p. 82, using no verb. The like, in the sense of as, was coming in; they fight like develles, p. 9.

The Preposition is now placed after its case; (children) of two yeeres age and within, pp. 2 and 5; another manuscript has the new under for within.

There is the cry hof! hof! p. 73, with which young gallants began their speeches for the next eighty years; Skelton has huffa! huffa!

Among the French words are bewteful, elegant (written ilezant in p. 73), redolent, apostylesse. In p. 61 the verb opteyn gets the new sense of hold ground; a sense still kept by us. There is the curious phrase a soveryn (optimus) servant, p. 76. We have seen the phrase in ure; we now have, p. 134, woman, inure (inured) in mekenesse; thus a new English verb is compounded. We find Malmeseyn (Malmsey), p. 72; in the same page is the old clary and the new form claret.

In Collier's 'Dramatic Poetry,' vol. ii. p. 213, there is a piece that may date from about 1490. The d is added, roune (susurrare) becomes ronde in your ear. A man, almost hanged, says, we had a nere runne, p. 215. The ecce signum, Falstaff's future phrase, is set in the middle of the English text.

In the 'Paston Letters,' 1485-1500, Reginald is softened, when Ser Reynold Bray, the well-known minister of Henry VII., is mentioned in p. 332; hence the surname Reynolds. The Earl of Surrey, the future conqueror of Flodden, turns fader into the new fathir, p. 366.

As to the new Substantives, a rebel chief calls himself Robyn Godfelaws brodyr, p. 362. A young Paston complains of the price of horsflesche (equorum), p. 376. The old idiom of the Double Genitive is carried a step further in the same page; we read of a hors of a persons (belonging to a parson). A peculiarly East Anglian word stands in p. 365, lobster (stoat); Garnett has discussed the word.

In p. 352 it is lamented that there is no grete lady to meet the King; an obvious translation from the French.

As to the Verbs, a town is dronkyn drye, p. 352, when the King and his retinue visit it. A man is crasid in his mynde, p. 391; the verb, hitherto a synonym of frangere, was later to be restricted to this particular sense. We see the Dutch hoy (navis).

Among the Romance words are skillet, inestymable, to qwestyon, bede rolle.

A manuscript written about this time (referred to in the Preface to 'Gesta Romanorum,' p. xx.) gives us a new idiom connected with few; we see a fewe of the tales; this differs much from the old âne (soli) feâwa worda (a few words).

In 'Caxton's Life,' by Mr. Blades, we see the new word Chirchwardeyn used in a document of 1491 (p. 162). The old late (nuper) becomes lately in a book of 1493 (p. 362).

In 'Gardner's Letters of Richard III. and Henry VII.,' 1485-1500 (Master of the Rolls), we see Bemares (Beaumaris) in ii. 297, followed by Bewemares in the next page. There is the contraction Chomley for Cholmondeley in ii. 283. The Irish Cavanagh appears as Cavenok, ii. 304. In i. 109 breche stands for inimicitia. A ship is called a man of warre, ii. 69. In a Scotch document we hear of peetis (peats) and colis, ii. 332; the former word is said to come from bet-an, to mend the fire, like the purse of 1220 from bourse. There is the skippar of a ship and the Northern form raid. We see the Verbs to ren a cours and to onhelme; there is the phrase take him into favor, i. 92; be of oone mynde, ii. 67.

We see balest (ballast), which, like many of our sea terms, came from the Dutch.

The Romance words are signe manuell, evyte (avoid), baroness, of a sewerte, he was out of wages (pocket, ii. 317), deputie lieutenant (of Ireland). The old jangle changes its meaning, for we hear of the changelyng of bellis, i. 394. We see the first hint of a new sense in a Verb, our resolved mynde is, that, etc., i. 110.

We have the Celtic kerne and galoglasses, ii. 67.

In the 'Rolls of Parliament' from 1485 to 1496 we remark the change of Hobekin into Hopkyn, p. 279; there are both Bedlem and Bethleem, p. 372; we find Ippeswiche in p.

512; while the rightful g still remains prefixed to the word in p. 519. The new restfulness stands for quies, p. 431. A Bristol petition in p. 391 complains of the paving as holowid and pitted by water; here the second verb is new. In p. 288 stands the phrase upon youre honour. There is the Dutch lyghter (navis). Among the Romance words are disable (there is also the older verb unhable), the waytershipp (an office), gentilman husher, raungership (of the forest). In p. 276 stands to forejuge of honors (in an attainder); this is one of the last instances where our for, the Greek para, is prefixed to a Romance word. In p. 386 February supplants the old Feverer. In p. 450 we read of Viscount Welles and Dame Cecilia his wife; it seems that we had not as yet coined Viscountess.

In the 'Acts of Parliament' (1488-1496) we see new substantives like slaughter howze, brickleyer, clyncher, p. 586. In p. 603 stands the curiously terse new phrase, the then and nowe Duke. We here remark that syn has long been encroaching upon sith in the South. As to the Romance words, in p. 638 (it is the age of Cabot) we hear of the Marchauntes Adventurers, a name still in Bristol use, with but little alteration. Chaucer's verb compoune now undergoes the usual English change and becomes componde; compose came later. There is also in leage (foedus), which bears a sense something different from that of the old liege; the new word seems more akin to the Italian lega than to the French ligue; perhaps we may here trace the influence of Papal envoys.

In the 'Plumpton Letters,' 1485-1500, we see the old form Everwick for York; it is in a French document, p. ciii. Our gamekeeper appears first as keeper of the game, p. 79. In p. 124 stands (it) may be my making; we should say, "the making of me." We have in p. 132 a dede of gift.

In p. c. we see how an Adjective can be made a Substantive; certain closes are there called The Flates (flats). There is the term weighty, p. 61, used by the Earl of Northumberland, slain in 1489. In p. 111 men will have something, be yt right or wrong. In p. 123 we read of a widow, worth m. pounds. In p. 63 a Preposition is made an adjective ; we hear of a thorow search ; it had been made an adverb twenty years earlier.

Among the Verbs did was once more coming into use ; he dyd ziffe is in p. 49. In p. 67 is stand good master unto, etc. ; hence comes stand treat. In p. 140 is take in good parte.

There is a new use of to in p. 109, she hath not a cloth to her backe ; here some word like fitted must be dropped ; there was the Old English shapen to his likeness.

As to the Romance words we find the Latin strictly (not the French straitly), p. 54 ; comered (comrade), a myskidyd (misguided) woman is opposed to a good woman, p. 77. In p. c. Elizabeth and Isabell are used for the same proper name ; this lasted for sixty years. I give a number of phrases from a French document in p. ciii. which will show the influence of the law upon our speech, issue, covaunt, a le valure de, a aver a eux, le remainder, enfeffer in fee, sur condition que, le resideu, pourveu que, son heire apparaunt, les premises, accordant a, in due maner, per force de quel, un Henry Sotell, excepts terres, autres persons, re-eyaunt.

In Halliwell's 'Original Letters of Kings,' Henry VII. gives his Royal sanction to the use of get in the Northern sense of ire ; get to the sea, p. 176. He is fond of sure ; to be sure of his life, ye be sure ye shall have, etc., p. 182.

In the 'Testamenta Eboracensia,' iv., we see chirch warden, riding horse; heirlome (often occurring now) is slightly changed from the heir to heir lome of 1424. A person talks of my suster Bygott, p. 152, where the surname comes instead of the Christian name. There is have word of it. The Romance words are casket, to be extreme, p. 50. A new word is formed from the French gris ; a griselde stag, referring to colour, p. 130.

In Davies' 'York Records,' Richard III., six years after his death, is called a crochebake ; he was said to have been beried in a dike (ditch) like a dogge, p. 221. Farther to the North dike now expresses agger, not fossa. In p. 256 stands the phrase to drawe (up) a paupire (paper). In p. 224 stands any tyme ye plesse to call, where the it is dropped before plesse.

In Rymer's documents for 1492 we see have 13 billes

(billmen) on foote, p. 479; hence our "set on foot." The new and the old, according and after (secundum), are coupled in p. 478. We hear of the Archduke, and of the Kingis Grace; there are the words quietful and prolix. The old namely is supplanted by videlicet in p. 480.

Skelton, the first famous Southern poet since Lydgate, wrote a poem in 1489 (Dyce's edition, vol. i.), in which he talks of Lady Bes, the short for Elizabeth, p. 6; there is also double deling, p. 16, and wondersly, p. 17, leading the way to our wondrously. In a poem written about this time, to be found in Skelton, vol. iii., we see the strange compound to preantedate, p. 357.

Pynson printed an edition of the 'Promptorium Parvulorum' in 1499, which shows further changes in our tongue since the manuscripts of 1485 already referred to.

The n, it will be seen, is inserted in glansyng, our glancing. Pynson prints y for the old þ, which was now all but gone; the following note is written in one copy of his book:—"all these y stande for th, acordinge as the Saxon carracte was in this sort—þ, and so we pronounce all these wordes at this day with th." See 'Promptorium Parvulorum,' p. 535. The older editions of this work employed swaggyng or swablynge for the stopping or drying up of blood; Pynson turns this into swabbyng, the Dutch word well known to our sailors. In the edition of 1441 clothes were said to teryyn (vetero), a kindred form of the verb tarry; in p. 522 we see that Pynson has mistakenly turned weryd or teryd into worne or torne. We have above the true source of the last word in wear and tear; it must mean exhaustion. In p. 493 stands tydy (probus), for which an edition of this time gives the synonym theende, the old Present Participle in ende of the verb the-on (vigere); it is curious that so old a form should come down to 1500. There are the new French words reeme (of paper) and compostyn (stercoro), which gave Shakespere a word for manure.

Some poems in the 'Babees' Book' (Early English Text Society) seem to date from 1500; we here read of a schoolmaster peppering (flogging) a boy, p. 404; the old verb cun or con gets a new sense, "to con a book," p. 25; salt must be taken with a clean knife, p. 23; it is wrong to speak or laugh with the mouth full; the hand must be held before the mouth when you spit; the weighty line comes in—

"Here and se, and sey thou nought."

There are some pieces in the 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' i. 43, 70, 116, 287; ii. 76, which may be set down to 1500 or so. I give our earliest specimen of memoria technica; it is applied to the Kings of England, i. 288—

"Wil. Con. Wil. Rufus, Hen. pri. Steph. Hen. que secundus, Ri. Johan. Henricus. Edwardus, tres, Ri. que secundus, Henricus quartus, Hen. quin., Hen. quoque sextus,
Ed. quart, Ed. quintus, Ri. tercius, septimus Henry."

The Creed is now called the byleve, i. 43. Among the Verbs, in i. 117 stands to breke upe the scole; disintegrate will soon be the genteel word to use here. In i. 45 a man calling his guests to him cries, sirs, come awaye (along). In i. 46 there is a new use of at, wish them at the devil; also of for in i. 71, weep for company. In ii. 76 by, by, lulley! is the song sung by a mother to her babe. In i. 47 a priest is for the first time spoken of as this gentylman; the noble old word was afterwards to be shamefully abused by being applied to all ranks.

There are two pieces in the 'Digby Mysteries' (New Shakespere Society) that seem to belong to 1500; these are the 'Conversion of St. Paul' and a 'Morality of Wisdom.' There are old forms such as beth (sunt) and wondyr wylde, p. 160; but there are words like furour, not found before Barclay. The new Substantives are a barowfull, slugishness; the Five Wits (senses) had long been known, and are mentioned in p. 144; but in the next page we make acquaintance with the Five wyttys of the soul. We read of fyne clothyng, p. 155. The phrase other than had long been used to express difference; in p. 49 Saul is another man than he was.

Among the Verbs are begrymlyd (begrimed), choppe and chaunge (a favourite phrase of Tyndale's), take wyll for dede, p. 147. In p. 167 we read of drawte notes in singing; hence came the later drawl, much as draggel was formed. In p. 30 a man is thought a knave; any one looking at you would think ye were at the next dore by; hence our "next door to a fool," where the at is dropped and the by is exchanged for to.

Among the Romance words are suer of foot, stabyll grom, Goddes provysyon (providence). In p. 30 hosteler changes to the new meaning of "attendant on horses." In p. 161 enbrace takes the new sense of "follow after;" it is here applied to questes (inquests); sixty years later it was to be applied to opinion. There are such Latin forms as amyke (friend) and desiderable (desirable). In p. 157 the phrase la plu joly is put into the mouth of a debauched character—a French phrase in the midst of English words.

There are many poems that seem to belong to the latter half of Henry the Seventh's reign in 'Hazlitt's Collection.' The n is clipped, for Malmeseyne becomes malmasyes (malmsey); the s is added, as afterwardys. The old trone is exchanged for throne, iii. 19, showing Latin influence; the form exsteme, a few years later, shows a confusion between Latin and French. In the Notbrowne Mayde the oo plesure of the edition of 1502 is altered into one plesure in the edition of 1521; see ii. 283.

Among the new Substantives is neverthryfte (neerdowell), nypple, formed from neb; a spear is put in rest, i. 258; there is tylte (tilt-yard), in-comynge (entrance), whence in-come. A wight may be brainless as a Marsh hare, a favourite phrase of Skelton's. A man addresses his parent as Lady mother. There is hyll and dale, pygges in a poke. In ii. 119 a body stands for homo. The word man is added to another noun, as marchaunt man.

Among the new Adjectives are braynles, unkind, a pretie deale, iii. 122, where the adjective begins to get the sense of magnus.

About this time the Accusative you is much used for the proper Nominative ye. The use of the it is curious in i. 220, ever they prayed, but yt woulde not be; this it must stand for their prayer.

Among the Verbs are keep open housholde, take theyr legges (we put to after the verb), make provysyon, I can beleve, fall to making shoes. A Noun is made a verb when a man freers well (plays the friar), iii. 125. Our run gets the new sense of agere; run his sword through, i. 237. The verb shrink gets the new sense of withdrawing; he shranke behynde, i. 260. The verb duck becomes intransitive and need not refer to water; a friar dooks, iii. 125.

Among the new Adverbs is what than? To come abrode is opposed to stay at home, iii. 124. There is the new wonderosly instead of wondersly, ii. 117; wondrous was soon to follow. A form of 1400 is repeated; instead of not a whit sorry we find in i. 227 the devyll have the whyt that he was sorye; hence Roye's devil a bit. The away comes after another verb, dispute away money, iii. 120.

The old for is replaced by to in ten to one (ten times as much), iii. 4.

Among the Romance words are repast, a quit rent, troublous, to point to, tryumphaut, valour (worth), gorgeous, pastime, charitable, sumptuos, overte (open), employ, intoxicacyon, an olde trotte (anus), as I am enfourmed. Lydgate's splene now means ira, ii. 292. The word comfortable in the next page means benignus; Coverdale rather later calls Henry VIII. "our most comfortable Noah." In iii. 11 we see both the old French frayle and the new Latin fragylyty. The Preposition according to comes often now. There is taunt, from the French tanter, tancer. In ii. 126 the word aydes is applied to men, like our aide de camp. There is pleate mercy (ask for it), and the law term commence an action. A broad distinction is drawn in iii. 153 between gentylnes and gal-auntysse (dandyism).

In iii. 160 we find the assertion that England is the Virgin's dower.

About the year 1500 a Welsh bard made a phonetic transcription of an English hymn to the Virgin; he thus becomes our guide as to the Salopian pronunciation of his day.¹ The changes here seen were to tell on London speech about a hundred years later. It appears that in Salop the i had got the sound of German ei; Christ, die, and guide were pronounced as in our day. The ee and oo were sounded like the French i and ou, as see, queen, noon, soone. The oi had taken its present sound, as assoile; at this time the combination was sounded in three different ways by English mouths. The owe was pronounced like o, as bowe (arcus), slowe. The word earth was sounded like yearth; he and nigh were pronounced as at present; but the guttural gh in the middle of the word, as a general rule, was heard in Salop; and the k in know was still marked in speaking. The th was now substituted for d in fader, moder. The words our, housel were pronounced somewhat in our way, but not exactly so. The e at the end of words was already clipped; the e in tooke was not sounded.

In the Letters of the first Tudor Kings, printed by Halliwell (1500-1513) we see the ending ness often used in compounding new nouns, as farness, extinctnes (extinction). The Romance words are brief (Papal letter), relation takes the new sense of kinsman, p. 191; we hear of the contents of a letter; impressment is mentioned in connexion with the navy, p. 214, but it here means interference. In the same sentence stands allowably; in p. 216 stands specialities, where we should now use particulars.

We find in a play, written about 1510 (Collier, 'Dramatic Poetry,' ii.), a doublet of a new make, p. 220; this noun is something new, and had been before expressed by the French fasoun. The French routier appears as rutter, p. 221; Tyndale was fond of this word for a soldier; England was now once more drawing on foreign nations for her terms of soldier-craft.

Henry the Seventh in his will talks of a plot (sketch or design) for his chapel; this was rather later to be written platform; in 1670 we were to talk of the plot of a play.

Collier ('History of Dramatic Poetry,' i. 61) gives a piece dating from about 1508, in which occur the words chese mongers, chymney sweepers, costerde mongers, bere brewers, muskel takers, purse cutters, money batterers, players (gamesters), a new sense of the word. In another piece, written not long afterwards, p. 63, we find hote houses (unconnected with fruit). In p. 64 occurs the form varlet, the old French form of valet; we also learn that cards consist of hertes, dyamondes, trayffles, pykes (spades). In p. 77 masculer is used for masker; the masque was becoming a favourite amusement.

In the 'Testamenta Eboracensia,' iv., we see have it to his owne use, p. 313. There is the Dutch noun clamp. We see the cumbrous phrase my lady's grace of Norfolk; a well disposed prest (referring to the mind, not the body), p. 206. Barclay's she will indevor to, where herself is dropped after the verb, appears in the year 1506, p. 255.

There are some pieces of this time in the 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' ii. 72, 115; i. 317. The word fane down to this time may still mean vexillum, p. 116; it was soon to be supplanted by Palsgrave's flag; fanés are placed on the outsides of the quere; the new preposition outside was speedily to be coined. The supporters of the Royal arms, soon to be sculptured all over the Chapel at Windsor, are called "the King's beasts." In ii. 74 there is a new use of go; "how many straws go to a nest?" the answer is, "none, for lack of feet." There is another pun in the next page, where all stands both for omnis and subula; the old Southern variation of this, oul, was henceforth cast aside. At the siege of Terouenne we hear of the lieutenant general, and also of the capeteyn general, i. 317, Marlborough's future title. In the next page mention is made of standing water.

In the 'Babees' Book' (Early English Text Society), p. xcvi., we hear about this time of a bass in music; three pages later the word is written bais, just as we sound it now.

In 'English Gilds' (Early English Text Society) we see in the year 1504 the yn-side of the tabell, a new noun, soon to become a preposition, p. 327.

William Dunbar wrote at Edinburgh not long after the year 1500 in Northern English.¹ He was our best poet in the long gap of 200 years between Chaucer and Spenser ; indeed, he could hit off a picture with a few sharp touches of his brush far better than the great Edmund.

The a replaces e, for the old hende (paratus) becomes handy, p. 37. We see the Northern ai used for a, as in the lairdis of ladies, p. 137 ; Scotland has since then made a sharp distinction between laird and lord. The o is inserted, for the old besme becomes besom. The o replaces a, as Jock fule, p. 146. We see the French word burreau (carnifex, probably sounded like their bourriou), p. 334 ; if so, the words with which it here rimes, snaw, blaw, law, must have had the sound of French ou. The ou replaces o ; the old stoppa (poculum) appears as stoup, p. 94. The u replaces i, as rumple (ruga) for the rimpil of the 'Promptorium.' We see spoil for spill, p. 239, as in Devonshire. There is a wonderful contraction in phisnomy, p. 317. In p. 330 we have the two forms Ersche and Erische (Irish).

There is the old waw (fluctus) in p. 318 ; also duerch (nanus), p. 332. The s is expunged, brastl (fragor) becomes brattle ; sc is prefixed, for rumple becomes skrumple, p. 319, reminding us of cracch and scratch. The t is dropped in quhissil (whistle) and chop (jaw) ; this is the chafte of 1483. The th is added, pourté becomes puirith, p. 319. There is gambol, the French gambade, p. 283. The well-known contraction of Auchinleck into Afflek is seen in p. 254.

The new Substantives are heather, pyk-thank, flaw, cadger. The old makar expresses poeta here, though it seemed rather old-fashioned to Sidney seventy years later. We see in p. 58 Chaucer's old use of freedom (nobilitas), a sense soon to vanish. There is the old aucht (opes) and kynrick (regnum), words that had long been dropped in the South ; curious it is that Scotland should still preserve so many of England's lost treasures. For instance, I am constantly hearing the verb lippen (credere) used by Northern peasants ; but this word is never met with in any Southern book after 1160. In p. 320 a man is likened to ane gallow breed ; the first instance of breed, the noun. The new substantive drunkart is coined in p. 210 ; it is strange that this word was not struck off earlier, considering the habits of our island. The Adjective odd is turned into a Substantive, p. 71 ; the Virgin is to mak our oddis (mala) evyne. The old knop now expresses buds of roses, as in Dutch.¹ In p. 165 a bad dancer is called a juffeller, one who shuffles through his work ; the verb is Scandinavian. The noun elf is used as a term of abuse, p. 330. The noun crack seems to be slipping into its modern Scotch sense (loquela) in p. 239 ; it stands here halfway between fragor and loquela ; a man may spoil his good service by unseasonable cracks and cries. The truly Scotch skipper (connected with a ship) appears once more in p. 335 ; our shipper has now a very different meaning. The old Cuthbert becomes Cuddy, p. 174 ; and Alexander appears as Sandy, p. 251 ; Englishmen, on the other hand, dock the last half of the Greek word, and make it Alick. The Arabian prophet Mahoun is used as a synonym for the Devil in p. 96 ; and this usage appears also in Burns ; we still read of the old Termigant in p. 339.

As to Adjectives, the ancient engellic is revived, after a long sleep, as angel-like, p. 30. The ed, as we saw in Yorkshire in 1250, is much used in forming adjectives, as honeyed ; there are also the Romance evil-faced and wan-visaged. The ending sum has always been a favourite with the Scotch ; they preserved winsome and coined hindersome ; we here see the wholly new ugsum, p. 65, and tiresome, p. 265 ; fensum (offensive), p. 127. There is the foreign able used in unourcumable (invincible), p. 268. In p. 222 we see sorrowful and sad ; the latter word was soon to be used for tristis by Tyndale as well as by Dunbar ; the first inking of the change had appeared in 1350. In p. 67 the word trum seems to keep its meaning validus ; Christ comes to suffer for mankind full trimily ; but in p. 165 a lady dances trimly (elegantly) ; the idea of ornament was soon to be attached to the verb trim ; our handsome has undergone much the same change.

As to Pronouns, in p. 153 we now see the corruption of Orrmin's Reflexive Dative, him ane (alone by himself); instead of writing you alone, in p. 153 Dunbar has solitar walking your alone; I remarked upon this in the year 1320. In p. 222 there is a new phrase for men and women, "they will say, baith he and she;" it had been used of beasts in 1290. The Southern corruption of the Plural othere had now reached the North; we find oderis letteris, p. 18, fra others, p. 89.

Among the Verbs are be tyit up (hanged), clash, run down a man, tak thy choice. In p. 137 ladies are graithit up gay; the source of our get up, applied to dress. In p. 172 stands the verb lichtly (parvi pendere), a most curious instance of a verb formed from an adverb. In p. 334 we find to back thee; here a verb is formed from a noun. The old erd had meant habitare down to 1350; it now stands, p. 10, for sepelire, and gave rise to our unearth. In Layamon's forriden the first syllable had stood for ante; in Dunbar the same stands for the kindred Greek para; we hear of a forriden (for-ridden) mule, p. 285, like forsworn.

As to Adverbs, hard expresses something different from vix or cito in hard beside him, p. 95, our hard by; a man swears braid, in the same page, like Caxton's use of the adjective; this braid must be the source of broad (coarse) humour. In p. 165 a man dances homelty-jomelty (higgledy-piggledy); these riming words were now coming in fast both in the North and South.

There is a new use of the Preposition under in p. 335, the ship was under sail; this may come from the Middle German under wegen; our under way was to appear later.

The new Interjection tut! is seen in p. 97; bae stands for the cry of sheep in p. 323.

There is the Low German loon, queer, p. 324.

There are the Celtic words tartan, catherein (cateran), coronach, pet (darling), tedder (tether), brat.

There are Southern forms which must be due to Dunbar's love for Chaucer; we see y-bent, ago, forthy, triumphing. In strong contrast to these stand the curious words long in Scotch use, such as wallidrag, limmer, skirl, attercap, widdy (gallows).

Among the Romance words are cummer (the York commoder), lintel, totum (the toy), lounger, dregar (oyster dredger), modern, artist, dine on creddens (credit, p. 141), ruffian, incuby (an imp). The Scotch were fond of tack, from atache; we have already seen it used for a lease; it now, p. 84, stands for a nail. The word geste (jocus) gives birth to jestour, p. 111; and St. Clown, the patron of minstrels, appears in p. 128. The word brigand loses its former honourable sense and is made a term of abuse, as in France, p. 329. The old stuf is employed for a physician's compounds, p. 167. If breakfast arose in the London Court thirty years earlier, disjone, p. 204, was its synonym at the Edinburgh Court; Scott uses this form. We hear of practicians in medicine, and of the facultie, a word applied to poets, p. 250. The word sot, after a long sleep, comes to life again in p. 336. A groom is still called a hors marschael, p. 335; the last word seems to have been peculiar to the North; it occurs in the 'York Mysteries.' A man is addressed as damnit dog, p. 339, which is something new. There is the new construction, he pleases not till hear, p. 234, where the first word should be in the Dative; the same change was going on in the South. In p. 289 a hat is adorned richt bravelie; the v and u were, as usual in the North, confused, whence comes the Scotch brawly; the meaning of fortis did not enter into the word until much later. There is Achil (Achilles) pronounced in the French way, p. 269, and Cordilleris (Franciscans) appear in p. 142, a form not usual in our island. This was the great age of discovery; and Dunbar differs from earlier English poets by talking about Calyecot (Calicut) and the new-found Isle, p. 264; in p. 273 he takes a blackamoor or ane black for his subject; my ladie with the meikle lips. Like a true Scot he speaks of our island as Britain, p. 316. He is the first writer who makes the Thistle the emblem of Scotland, in 1503. He gives us a most terse proverb that afterwards crops up in 'Waverley,' of young sancts growis auld feinds, p. 44. Dunbar had a wonderful command of rime; see the poem in p. 69; the flyting between him and Kennedy, p. 313, is an invaluable treasure house of fine old Northern ribaldry.¹ The Scot is fond of imitating Chaucer and his enamellit terms celical; the licht of all our English, surmounting every tongue terrestrial. Our island, Dunbar tells us, was bare and desolate of rhetoric, until moral Gower and Lydgate laureate came with their mellifluate mouths; see p. 39. The Scotch poet will use hardly any Teutonic noun or verb at all, when, as in p. 267, he sings a great hero, our indeficient adjutory. We saw a mixture of Latin and English in some lines in the 'Towneley Mysteries.' Dunbar carries this further in his witty Testament of Mr. Andro Kennedy, p. 143.

Contemporary with Dunbar was Bishop Gavin Douglas. He turns bough (ramus) into bew as a rime for hue; the stuve of 1390 now becomes our stove; the old leye (novalis) is here written lea. The drabelin of the 'Promptorium' appears as dragged, with the usual change of consonants. The Old English mycg is softened into midge, an uncommon alteration of the hard g in Scotland. The Southern twinkle and twitter are seen here as quinckle and whitter. There are the peculiarly Scotch caller, eldritch; Orrmin's adjective trig (fidus) is still kept alive. We hear of a window, a little on jar (cherre); charwoman keeps the truer sound of the old noun. There is the adverb overhead (overhead). Among the foreign words are dent de lion, Palsgrave's dandelion.

In the Rolls of Parliament for 1503 we see of his mere mocion, p. 532, where the foreign adjective is new; the old verb possede is still holding its own against possess.

In the Acts of Parliament of this time we see theves and pikars (picking and stealing), reed deere and falowe, blokhouse, a braye (fossa); the old form kempt still remains; and catall keeping its Southern sense still stands for our chattels.

In the 'Plumpton Letters,' from 1500 to 1513, there are a few things worthy of remark. In p. 180 the rightuous of 1453 changes into our righteous. In p. 169 the epithet learned is applied to counsel (a lawyer). In p. 164 a man is made away with (killed), a most curious phrase, as the with is unneeded. In p. 180 a tenant asks his lord to beare him out in certain business; hence also comes our "help him out." There is the new compound with out, I lay at outside, p. 180; this was soon to be used as a preposition. Among the Romance words is the King's garde, p. cvii. In p. cx. beast is used for ox, and this is still the technical term among our farmers. We read, in p. 205, of a Prelate's Vicker generall; here we still put the adjective after the substantive.

In Gardner's 'Letters of Richard III. and Henry VII.' (1502-1509) we see lieufully written for lawfully, p. 282, a proof that the old law (coming from laga) was sometimes sounded like the French ou; there is also the old Southern bruge (pons), p. 411; Brandenburg becomes Brandborow, p. 445. The usual Colaine is written Colone, p. 201. The b is inserted, for the German Pommern is seen as Pomberne, p. 265; the v is struck out, I marled stands for I marvelled, p. 257. The g replaces w, for vanguard is written for the old vantwarde, p. 208; the g, even at this date, is softened, for we see ayenne (iterum) so late as the year 1503. There is an old form in p. 265, "he wol leane (lend) to you." The former cruciat becomes cruciade in p. 154, not far from our crusade. The t is struck out, for Luttich (Liège) is written Luke, p. 201. In p. 208 we read of the Souchyvers (Switzers); this v or u was later mistaken for n, and Tyndale talks of the Souchenars. The former issue is written yshu, p. 446, showing our present pronunciation of the word.

Among the Substantives we find that the adjective needy has given birth to nednyes, p. 228; there is also ontowardnes (a word of Wolsey's), p. 439; a bak doore, dryft (propositum), ryngledre, p. 238. We hear of the Grete Turke, of the marchant Fokers (Fuggers), of the George, the knightly ornament given to the Emperor Maximilian, of hede officers. An idiom of Page's is carried further in p. 257, ef he be the mane (man) I thenke he be. A man wishes for two monethis warnyng. We see the Dutch title of honour, yonker.

Among the Adjectives we see syklow (æger) in the year 1503, a very late instance of the old ending low or lew. There is harde of credens, p. 235, the over many wordes, a clobbed (club) fote, hii myndyd. Henry VII. has the honour of reviving an old obsolete Adjective, when he writes of noon outward (foreign) prince, p. 450 ; he also writes about these Lowe parties, p. 449 (the Low Countries).

Among the Verbs we find make offerture (overture), do you plesur, kepe you company, putte to libertie, gief their attendance, take a copy of, make my abode. The verb stike is much used for morari in these letters. In p. 208 stop is used intransitively, I think for the first time ; there is also the new noun a stop ; Barbour had written make a stopping. We see a new Scandinavian verb in p. 417, a barge well rigged. In p. 442 Wolsey says that ambassadors ly (morantur) in a certain place ; a hundred years later Wotton was to make his well-known pun on this phrase. We see God willing used with a Future. In p. 172 a man is myndid to do something ; the old verb mind was turned into a Passive, following the construction of the French avisé. The English Infinitive had for 200 years been used where quum must have stood in Latin ; this tense now expresses the Latin si, I shall never utter hym, to be drawn (si traherer) with wyld horses, p. 234.

As to Adverbs, thorough became an Adverb in the 'Paston Letters' about 1460 ; we now, in p. 194, see our form thoroughly. The Cheshire seyng that (quoniam) is used by Warham and other good writers. In p. 414 we have go straight aforehed ; the germ of our adverb ahead.

We have already seen under used when a man is hampered ; we now hear of men under suretie (in prison), p. 284.

As to the Romance words, we have nothing of importance (a favourite phrase of Wolsey's), impotent, to compound with, to be revengyd of them, legacye (embassy), disannull, lakkey, mine (mien), baggage, to advance (money), his traffykkes (the Shakesperian word for tricks, as here), pass articles, chaunge their myndes (purposes), money is curraunt, to esteme (appraise), bankett (feast), obteyn it to be doon, orator (spokesman).

We see restitution, which we use as well as restoration. In p. 415 minstrels doe their partes; the first time, I think, that the noun is applied to music. Wolsey uses integyr for entire, p. 443; we now confine the word to mathematics. The Italians, about this time, address Henry VII. as sacra regia majestas; they helped to revive "Your Majesty" as a title of honour. In p. 284 personaiges stands for viri. James IV., in p. 341, speaks of a crew as including mastir, 2 factours, skippar, sterisman. In p. 169 "the king's resolute mynde is to, etc.," this is a Latin form of the usual resolved. In p. 195 stands your naturall son; here there is no reference to bastardy; the English adjective was in honourable use throughout this Century.

In Hazlitt's 'Early Popular Poetry,' vol. iii., there is a piece that seems to belong to 1500. Here there is the phrase nice gear, p. 122, the latter word, equivalent to stuff, was to be worked hard all through the Century. In iv. 92 stands the adjective cranky (lascivus).

The letters of this time, printed by Ellis, are most valuable. We see the change in Queen Margaret's style; when she first went to Scotland she wrote London English; in a little time she adopted the dialect of her new subjects. Cardinal Bainbridge, when writing, shows himself to be a true Northerner. We find that ships play up and down, ii. 217; ie had the sound of ay, so the derivation of our intransitive plie, ply, is accounted for; ply, transitive, comes from applico. We see the d added to n, as sermond, p. 182; something like this may be seen lasting down to the year 1765. Meanwhile the n at the beginning is clipped, nafegar, nauger becomes agore, our auger, Series iii., vol. i. p. 148. The of is turned into a, as ten a clok, p. 214. There are the new Substantives fernesse (distance), mayn top, a row barge (rowing barge), the stocks (upon which a galley is). We see lee wales, like gunwales; walu was the Old English for vibex. There is the phrase a day after the fair, p. 211. The in is dropped before the Verbal Noun, when a man is doing (is in activity), p. 216; we still say, "to be up and doing." A great crack still stands for a boast or a lie. James IV. talks of his queen as our fallow.

An Adjective is followed by the Infinitive, I am bowldē to write ; we should substitute make for the second word.

Among the Numerals we see twice the money.

The Verbs give us many new phrases, such as come to any good, have the choice, lay to his charge, we named him unto the dignity, well trimmed (equipped), it weies with me, soldiers are fleshed to this enterprise, make tornys (of ships), make sail, speak a ship, we weyed (here anchor is dropped), to stop holes, to fecch the Downs, run on ground, fill (them) ther belies full, give us over (let us alone), smoke them out, break with him, stand his brother. There is the new form veer, our sailor's verb wear, vol. ii. p. 213. In Series iii., vol. i. p. 155 mariners will not go to the tradé, as one of the Howards writes ; the last word must mean voyage, and is the source of trade winds. It will be seen that there are many sea terms coming in ; we had already discovered the most Northern part of America ; in Series iii., vol. i. p. 161, we read of the vyage to an newfoundē land ; ships are now under captains.

Among the Adverbs we have, he did every thing like himself ; here the like seems to express similiter, not similis. In ii. 202 abrode stands for "out at sea ;" the word was changing its meaning from latè to foris ; in another place go abroadē means "out of his house." The lest is dropped in the sentence, for fear they should destroy. We read that a wryt is owt.

There is the phrase to my thinking, i. 88.

We see the Scandinavian leak. Among the Romance words are, a good means (here the s is added), gay (good) artillery, quarter of a mile, purser, the noise runs (bruit is also found), equipage (of a ship), paquet, partily (partly). We read of faicts of war ; we now make a difference between facts and feats, the Latin word and its French corruption. There is the curious new idiom to pass artillery the mountains, p. 199, where pass is made transitive. Queen Katherine writes, I am horrible besy. There is to continue sending, where the foreign verb imitates the Old English purhwunian in governing an Active Participle. In Series iii., vol. i. p. 148, provision seems to stand for victualling ; something is to be sent by post, to strait (starve) the army, be at issew, I am of opinion, sewre inough, if wynde serve.

Many of Skelton's poems (see Dyce's edition) date from between 1500 and 1513. He has many words, both Teutonic and Romance, first seen in the 'Promptorium,' a fact which makes for those who assign his birthplace to Norfolk. Such words are fop, scut, creak, pinch (play the niggard), also Lydgate's jumble. Skelton has the Northern theke (thatch), gar, mighty strong, dykes (fossæ), syke (talis), and the Participle flingande. He has Manning's peculiar sense of toy; to toye with him, p. 50; and such old words as pykes (pickaxe), queed (malum), spell (enuntiare), broke (taxus). He often uses a lilting metre, as in his poem on Flodden, p. 202.

Skelton speaks of Burdeou and Bordeu; examiners in our own day are fond of giving this French city as a puzzle for luckless spellers. Chaucer's bitour is now seen as bitter, not far from our bittern. The w is struck out; Chaucer's preshwold becomes threshold, p. 126. The l is struck out; the sparrow Philip becomes Phip; hence the name Phipps. The very old form Sothray (Surrey) is found in p. 112. The character ȝ is in constant use.

Among the Substantives are wagtayle, puffin, bumme, swyllynge (hog's wash), sypwet. There are also unthryftiness, spynnyng whele, syde sadell, dyscheclowte, sea borde, rosebud. A flirting woman is called a fys-gygge, p. 128; gigge had been used in this sense in the 'Ancren Riwele;' whirlegig was yet to come. We see our robyn redbrest in p. 74. There is with bounses, p. 106; there was a verb bunsen (pulsare) in the 'Ancren Riwele.' In p. 68 comes sove stytchis of silk; here the second word is applied to working, which is something new. In p. 52 a payre of bones stands for dice. Hampole's sense of way reappears, the wayes (demeanour) that ye have, p. 48. A silly head becomes a noddy polle, p. 142; hence Tom Noddy. In p. 73 comes, I played with him tyttell tattyll; in p. 111 stands "With a whym wham, Knyt with a trym tram."

Skelton is fond of these alliterations and vowel-changes.

We see puwyt for the cry of the lapwing, p. 74. We read of an Egyptian, that is, a gipsy, p. 111. There are two new Substantives opposed to each other in p. 140, the outhsyde and the insyde. In p. 148 stands the invitation to kiss, bas me, buttyng, praty Cis! here the noun seems to pave the way for the later baby bunting; Cis is a great contraction of Cecile. The frame, which had meant fabrica in the 'Promptorium,' now expresses conditio, p. 150; our "frame of mind;" out of frame soon became a common phrase. The word shank had not then the lowering idea of our days; it is applied to the limbs of Christ on the cross, p. 168. Something is compared to a Marche harum (hare), p. 177, riming to the Latin parum. In p. 177 gospeller means a priest that reads the Gospel, something like the old sense of the word; twenty years later it was to be applied to Lollards. Skelton uses Northern words, such as daw, which is in constant use; there is also Daucock, which may have led to Shakespeare's bawcock, with the usual change. The word cateran was now known at London; Skelton, in p. 205, talks of the Scottes and Irysh keteringes that followed James IV. to Flodden. In the same page he imitates the Lowland dialect when basely reviling the dead Monarch, "Kynge Jamy, Jemmy, Jocky, my jo!"

Among the new Adjectives are drowsy, mysproud, ropy, gorbellyd. From former Substantives and Verbs are derived gawdy, fonny (stultus), dirty, crazy. We see our common he shall be nameles in p. 174. Skelton changes the Old English scurfed into scurvy, applying the epithet to a face, p. 109. We find fayre play in p. 30. In p. 70 stands my lytell prety sparowe; here we now transpose the two adjectives; in p. 117 we find my prety bonny, the first instance of the use of this last word in the South, I think, for 200 years. The adjective ranke is applied to flesh, p. 128. The Old English teart (acidus) is revived after a sleep of Centuries.

Among the new Verbs is flybitten. There are the new expressions have a favour to, stand in our light, come whan it wyll, lay to pledge, cast a shepys ie (on a lady, p. 141), kepe it in store, it is worne thredbare, ware the hawke, know asonder

(apart), play prankys. The old dash gets the new meaning of miscere, p. 21; the new intransitive stop appears once more, his nose is never stoppynge, p. 110; that is, always running. In p. 111 stands the hard phrase symper the cocket; the last word may be the French coquette. Skelton delights in alliteration; he has, in p. 114, flip and flap, where the first word is new; also it wygges and it waggess (hence, wiggle waggle). In p. 132 is the new phrase beknave me; this be we may still prefix freely to verbs. In p. 148 is sche praiid you walke; we should say, walk off.

As to the Adverbs, Orrmin's o loft now appears in the form of aloft, p. 53; there is also aflo. Skelton is fond of now and then; he has the pleonasm over to mikell, p. 112.

Among the Prepositions we see to your face (coram te), p. 46. The upon sometimes implies the direction of feeling towards an object, as dote upon her, p. 84. The out of is developed; we see out of seson, out of frame (keeping), very common in this Century.

Skelton abounds in new Interjections. We have gup, addressed to a horse, p. 29, humlery home, a warning to silence, p. 57, like the later mum! Bo! p. 58; fo! is the sound of disgust, p. 115; the Northern tut! p. 215. A poem begins abruptly with ay, beshrew you! p. 35. We have something like Manning's phrases, such as tully valy, strawe! p. 35; this may be perhaps the old trotevale; there is also Manning's Lord, how he wolde pry! p. 65. There is both the old wolde God! p. 64, and the new wolde to God! p. 48. A boastful man is called Syr Dalyrag, p. 145; hence, perhaps, the verb ballyrag, still sometimes heard.

There is the proverb tyme wyll no man byde, i. 160.

There are the Scandinavian verbs lumber, simper, also bungler; a man is said to be in dumpys. There is trowle (trull) from the High German; a man is called an ill patch, which is Low German; hence our crosspatch. There is the Celtic drab, used of a woman.

Among Romance words we see fusty, mangy, saucy, lyttera-ture (scientia), sampler, bouget (purse, whence our budget), tunable, parwne (a pledge), of (on) purpose to sow, p. 68, gam-bone of bacon, capcyous, grose (vulgar), essencial. There is the expression, but to the poynte to procede. The verb touch gets the new sense of irritare in p. 205 ; hence our touchy. The word estate had hitherto meant jus possidendi ; it now seems to get the new meaning of terra, the thing possessed ; bonde tenant to his estate, p. 206. The out is prefixed to Romance words, as an owtery, to outface ; in the last instance out, as usual at this time, supplants over. The old quite (omnino), sparingly used hitherto, was now making way ; she was quyte gone, p. 85. The word parote (Pierrot) comes in, p. 145 ; the old word had been poppingay. There is bas (osculari), whence comes our buss. Skelton has pang (dolor) ; here the French poign is said to be confused with the Celtic prong. The first sense of pretend is very plain in p. 149, thow claimist thee jentyll. The seasons are mentioned in p. 161, and the first is called the tyme of vere. Skelton may be called the father of English slang ; still, when writing a hymn to God, he thinks it needful to abound in fine Romance words ; see p. 162 ; a purer taste was to come in later in the Century.

There are some sermons by Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, in 1509 (Early English Text Society) ; his words are more aureate than those of Tyndale, some years later ; but he keeps a few old phrases. We see both of the forms, humyle and humble, brytel and bruckle, slipper and slyppery. The d is added, for Chaucer's newefangel becomes new-fangled, p. 156.

Among the new Substantives are flow, p. 273, towardnes. Fisher addresses his hearers as my lordes and maysters ; the old word soverains had gone out. The word mind seems to get the meaning of sententia ; to speak a mannes mynde, p. 140. In p. 195 stands his essencyall beyng.

Among the Adjectives we find inwarde pyte, p. 96 ; this had hitherto been an adverb. We are told that Henry the Seventh was colde (in danger), our cool.

Among the Verbs we see make a blessyd ende, my bounden duty.

Among the Adverbs are of a trowth, where the a has been inserted since 1400 ; last (lastly), p. 255, ferre of (off), p. 273, the old of feor ; a fresshe, p. 133.

The phrase extra corpus is translated outwarde from his body, p. 64 ; men were feeling their way to use outside as a preposition. There is it must be abyden by, p. 221, where the Passive is still further developed. †

Among the Romance words are basshefull, p. 253, ionkerres (junkettings), chefe ruler, grossenes, assuredly, easynes, of her owne charges. The French form egall is maintained ; studyentes, p. 301, is half French, half Latin. We hear of galant apparayle, p. 203 ; this adjective, like brave, was long afterwards to add the meaning of fortis to that of pulcher. In p. 240 there is one of the first allusions in English to the fearful morbus Gallicus, just imported from America ; Barclay touches upon it about the same time. Fisher often uses no doubt of, as a parenthesis ; no it follows the of. The ed is added to Romance words, for we see weyke spyryted, p. 253 ; a little lower down, spirit is used for courage.

Something may be gathered from the 'Gesta Romanorum,' printed by Wynkyn de Worde, about 1510 (Early English Text Society). We see the letter y written for the old þ in p. 438, yu for þu. In p. 441 freshe stands for sober ; in our day it is often used as a synonym for drunk. In p. 444 comes thy right mynde. In p. 429 we still find the old verb overrenne, not the new outrun ; in the next page get stands for ire. There are phrases like have hym at a vauntage, lay (down) the lawe. In p. 432 comes unknowynge to thee, he (did it) ; here the Active Participle seems to stand for the Passive, as beholding to was often written later for beholden to. In p. 429 wylfully still expresses voluntariè. There is the new phrase a ryght in the tree, p. 432 (jus possidendi), a usage which must come from the French or Latin. The Romance words are radiant, specyous (pulcher). England had long used plenteous ; we now see plentefull, p. 439 ; this comes also in Barclay, about this time.

Foxe (Cattley's edition) gives us a few documents, written about the year 1510, in vol. iv. We see to turn a penny, to storm, sit mum, a stump foot, merry and wise.

A Sarum Manual was printed at Rouen in 1510 (York Manual, Surtees Society, p. 86, towards the end) ; I think, by the old forms, that it must have been drawn up about sixty years earlier. This is one more instance how religion preserves old forms that have dropped out of common use; the character z for y is still often found here.

The 'Candlemas Play,' inserted in Marriott's collection of 'Miracle Plays,' dates from 1512. Men were now beginning to set do before the first Person of the Present Tense, I do perceyve, p. 202; it had long stood before the Imperative.

In Brewer's 'Letters of Henry VIII.,' i. 664, we see the famous word leaguer, from the German.

In the year 1511 we see haunsmen or hanshmen (henchmen), both forms; this comes from the Northumberland Household Book, quoted in the 'Promptorium,' p. 233.

Few things in English literature are stranger than the fact that a Scotch priest should come South, occupy a cure in Devonshire, and then become a most voluminous writer in a speech very unlike that of his childhood. Barclay translated the 'Ship of Fools' in 1509 (I have used Jamieson's edition, 1874). He was the first of our poets who is known to have dealt a sly hit to a brother bard (see his reference to Skelton's sparrow); in this last tendency he has had many followers. Barclay, I think, must have carefully studied Occleve, some of whose peculiar phrases he has revived. There can be little doubt about our poet's Northern birth when we see him use Wyntoun's his folys hede, ii. 268, also phrases such as O that he cursed is (qu'il est), wel and wo, to weray (maledicere) and ban, her good man (maritus), unleful, tan (taken), puerte (poverty), brether (fratres), wombe (belly), his yll wyllers, an ill name, anenst, womankynde (mulieres), have a crow to pull. His printer Pynson no doubt struck out many other Northern phrases. Barclay uses syns always, those (not tho), and still (semper); the Double Negative comes very seldom. These changes were probably established by Barclay in Court English, for his book was widely read. Unlike Skelton, our poet has very few Teutonic words that are now obsolete. The poem before us evidently had its influence on Tyndale a dozen years later.

Barclay uses a for e and au, as farvent, actour; he uses both deny and denay; iyen is written for oculi; lips drivel, not dravel. In ii. 4 we see both commend and commaund, each in its modern sense. The royalme is sounded like railme, i. 216. The form endue is written for endow.

Among the Consonants the t is inserted, for there is the form, turn laws up set downe, ii. 14; the th is added, we see the form comon welth; in the 'York Mysteries' welth had often supplanted the true wel. There is a curious confusion between the Teutonic brothel (malus), and the French bordel, i. 82; the upshot is brothelhouse. The l in the middle is struck out; we see hawse (halse, hoist), and cawme (calm); also of myd age, ii. 172. The R is called "the dog's letter," i. 182.

Among the Substantives we see ylnes (scelus), an ill (an evil), a frende in courte, watcher, game (gambling), taleberer, mayne sayle, rustynes, canykin (afterwards in Iago's song). The word wayes is often used, as in Skelton, to express habits; another's wayes, i. 34. There is the phrase man, woman, and child, to express universality. Barclay is fond of using bush when speaking of a man's hair; he even coins the verb to bush, i. 63. He employs gate (our gait) for incessus more than once; it had hitherto meant only via. Chaucer had used market betere; we now have a beter of the street, i. 296; whence our beaten track. There is the new Northern word dronkard, ii. 34. Our speere (spire) is used for pyramid, ii. 120. In ii. 45 fools care for nothing but what from hande to mouth is brought; a well-known phrase. We have seen lords of name; the name now takes an article, get him a name, ii. 101.

Among the Adjectives we find untrue (not veracious). The word homely (simplex) is now applied to clothing, not to a man, i. 40. A man is colde of langage, i. 105; hence, a cold reception; hitherto cold had been physical, not moral. There are phrases like wors than ever, wax drye (thirsty). There is the strange compound talcatyfe. The Latin nimius seems to be Englished in thy to great pyte, ii. 149.

Among the Pronouns what (qualis) is followed by an Article for the first time, I think, O what a cyte! ii. 105; which a company had appeared in 1300. We have one yll is past, as bad may come, ii. 250; here another is dropped before as. We read of folys nat a fewe; there is a very Latin idiom in some ar that thynke.

Among the Verbs stand the tyme hath ben when, etc., shoot wyde, keep silence, let a word slip, gyve his mynde to it, kepe a solem countenance, ete him out of hous, lye open to him, kest an anker, ships breke, the pryse doth aryse (rise), he takys all things like as they come. The must is used in a new sense, that of cupere; they must have many (houses), ii. 98. The Infinitive, as of old, replaces when with the Subjunctive, what mean ye thus to tere, etc., ii. 131; it is a madness to hope, etc., ii. 173; there is also have the brayne to comprehend, ii. 139, like the old grace to serve thee. The verb call now gets the sense of æstimare; I call you as bad as robburs, i. 118. The verb deck had hitherto meant tegere; it now perhaps slides into ornare; to overdeck with a hood, i. 168; the second meaning was soon to be well developed in other poems of Barclay's, a few years later. The verb giggle is used of men, i. 63. In i. 232 the way is greatly worne; this verb had hitherto been used of clothes. In ii. 25 stands he is in honde with Grece (busy about it). The verb brew is applied to wine, ii. 222; a trick of the perfidus caupo. There is the pleonasm, they dare be bold to, etc.

Among the Adverbs are laugh out lowde. The no, as in Chaucer, is put in the middle of a sentence, no beste, no, nat the bere, etc., ii. 304; this was to be used by Tyndale. The old by and by had meant protensus; it is now often used to express an interval between two actions, as in ii. 24 and 109. This change bears witness to the common love of delay; the similar change in presently was to come later. The use of abroad is much extended; it is often coupled with "all through the world;" Rome spred abrode hir fame, ii. 105, men are abrode in the sea, ii. 220.

As to the Prepositions, we remark talys tolde by (contra) Mardocheus, ii. 217; Tyndale followed this new meaning of by, which has not been long-lived. In ii. 252 men provide for myshap; here the for also gets the meaning of contra. The to, following the Gothic, stands after grow; grow to a tree, i. 47. There is the new phrase their house burns owre (over) theyr head, i. 125. The of, followed by no noun, becomes an adverb; leve of, i. 91. Gower had written away the tyranny! Barclay inserts a with after the first word, i. 40.

There is the seaman's cry to shyp! i. 3, with no verb.

The Celtic verbs are toss and quax; this last, from the Gaelic cuach (poculum), must have been brought by Barclay to the South; thirty years later it became quaff.

Among the Romance words are fruteles, rural, purser, quarter mayster (two ship officers), wastful, incline ears, decline from, enormity, satyre (a poem), to outgorge, operacion, desist, a sage (sapiens), pyllage, to be active, insolence, patroness, correct (for the press), a mind is abstract. There are many words, new in the South, afterwards adopted by Tyndale, such as folysshenes, vagabund, incredyble, destitute, lyberall, render, submyt him to, diceytful, be of none effect, also the Lancashire vesture. The word transpose is employed to express wresting of the law, i. 67. We see excheters used for officials, ii. 78; from them came cheaters fifty years later. The word fassion now means bodily adornment, i. 290; fassions are mentioned in connexion with garments. The word statelynes often means silly pride. Wrath is called a passyon, i. 184; Lydgate's bagage (præda) now means simply trash, i. 221. There are here two senses of conceit; we read of new conceytis (ladies' ornaments), i. 289, and their own conceyt (vanity), i. 290; Tyndale's favourite sense of the word. There is the word promoter used for a lawyer, ii. 50; fifty years later it was degraded to mean an informer. The word surety means safety, ii. 251, as put in surety. The word offer takes a new sense, polliceri, ii. 283. The word edit means simply give out, i. 6. The old put him in dever to is seen; but there is also the new coined endever to, which comes often. The law is said to be diffuse, ii. 226. The noun juger, not juge, is used of one who in common life passes judgment on others, i. 154. There is not only vice, but vyciousnes. We see furour, furiousnes, and furyosite. The word inconvenience, in the sense of damnum, is always coming. A man enjoyed hym (gavisus est) in the city he was building, i. 90; the enjoy and rejoice had long been running a parallel course. The foreign ending ist was coming in; we read of a planetyst, ii. 19; our poet thinks astronomy a juggle. The French had a phrase cheveux primes, delicate hair; a pryme, i. 250, means a paramour; our adjective prim has now a very different sense; but we still talk of a prime cut. We read of a botyll nose, i. 288. We see the Latin encroaching on the French; in ii. 43 stands make purveaunce of corn; in p. 44 comes provyyde sustenaunce; in p. 46 provysion, whereby he might feed them; here the word provision has all but got its modern sense of food.¹ Still, provide has not lost the sense of foresee. But we find fatygate where we now use the French form. There is uttraunce, the later outrance, not to be confused with the earlier utterance. We had long used past midnight; we now find past shame, ii. 55. Barclay is fond of after one rate (manner); not quite like our "at a great rate." A man is a great corporate body, ii. 82; a sort of pleonasm. The carle and vyllayne are coupled in a harmless sense, ii. 97. The word place was much used for domus; we see a ferme place, ii. 98. There is a curious confusion between the Substantive and Adjective in ii. 100, an almost infynyte of folys. There are the phrases bestely dronken, ii. 177, joyn hande to hande, maners of the table, in one instant. We see exposytour; we have now expounder and exponent as well, all from different parts of the old verb. The rascaille of 1400 was losing its harmless sense; rascold is used for nebulo, ii. 307. Barclay is very fond of volage, which he found in the French book he was translating. The verb jest is formed from geste (historia); it was to be a favourite verb of Tyndale's.

Barclay has many old proverbs and maxims for the first time; some have been a little altered since his day. We find—¹ Here the joke in 'Punch' comes in. Lawyer—What were the provisions of the will? Client—Provisions! that's just it! We have not got even bread and cheese.

- "Take ye in gode worth the swetnes with the sour (i. 39).
 When the stede is stolyn, to shyte the stable dore (i. 76).
 Lerne not to be a fole ; that cometh by it selfe (i. 178).
 Nothing is worse than a churle made a state (nobleman) (ii. 8).
 It is an olde sayd sawe,
 Lyke to lyke will drawe (ii. 35).
 One yll turne requyreth another (ii. 38).
 Be besy about your hay while Phebus is shining (ii. 45).
 Pryde will have a fall (ii. 159).
 One myshap fortuneth never alone" (ii. 251).

We hear much about the England of Barclay's day. Beggar's tricks were then much as they are now, i. 303. It was shocking that monks and priests danced, i. 294. A man is said to be a fool, who prefers the bagpipe to harp or lute ; an odd sentiment for a Scot, i. 256. Some kept their bonnets on when Christ was consecrated on the altar ; the Paynims in their temples were more devout, i. 223. A foretaste of the riotous Mohawks of 1710 is given in i. 299. England's sins were punished with diseases, "both uncouth and cruel ;" the new-come morbus Gallicus is referred to, i. 39. Not only Aristotle but also Plato is recommended ; a sign of the times, i. 147. Barclay wishes the English lion to join with the Scotch unicorn against the Turk, ii. 209 ; the dreaded enemy worshipped idols, a very old mistake. This countryman of Lord Bute's writes, we Brytons, ii. 16 ; he calls Henry VII. "the rede Rose redolent," ii. 16 ; that king's soberness in dress is held up as an example, i. 39 ; Henry VIII. also is mentioned. We hear that fools feast and drink on Sunday ; the Scotch poet calls that day the Sabbot, ii. 176. He speaks of the newe fonde londe, ii. 25, and hints at America, though not by name, ii. 26. The names Denys, Mawrys, and Patryke are given as Irish names, ii. 308. Barclay, on the question of blasphemy, differs from Cardinal Newman ; the latter, in one of his works, argues that the nations of Southern Europe show themselves more pious than the Englishman by their oaths ; most irreverent and filthy these oaths are, as every traveller knows. But Barclay thus rebukes the heavenly-minded blasphemer of his day—

“ And than these houndes can suche excusys fynde,
 As to theyr soules without dout ar damnable,
 Saynge it is gode to have the masse in mynde,
 And the name of God, and His sayntis honourable.
 O erytykes, O houndes abhomynable,
 That is a thyng whiche God almyghty lothys,
 To take His name in thy foule mouth by othys ” (ii. 133).

Some of Barclay's other poems, such as his 'Eclogues,' may be found in the Percy Society Collection, vol. xxii. The e is often sounded at the end of words ; but y is sometimes substituted, as Jeny for Jane. We read of an arrant thief, where a supplants e. Pecoock's avorpi now becomes aforde, p. 69. The new Substantives are bedfellow (not the old bedfere), Jacke with the bush (a hairy youth in office), p. xlv. There is the new phrase a back reckoning. A man is addressed as my mate! We find the plural silkes. The word rowm is used for a place at Court.

The old Adjective pert degenerates in p. liii., meaning no more than saucy ; it must have been confused with malapert.

The it is employed in a new construction, often seen in Heywood ; for this Pronoun is prefixed to a Verbal noun, where the Infinitive would be used in Latin, it is yll stelyng from a thefe, p. 36 ; this turn of phrase recalls Barclay's native land.

Among the Verbs we see clap (in prison), cleve like burre. There is the advice, spare a corner of thy belly, p. xlii. ; hence Goldsmith's "we'll all keep a corner." We see they are settled (are at ease), a new sense of this verb. As we saw before, the Dutch verb deck now gets the sense of ornare. The verb smyrk has degenerated from its old honourable sense ; see p. 26.

There is the Adverb earlier, p. 33, and by startes.

There is the borrowed term of abuse, abbey lowne or limnier of a monke, p. xxxvi. ; limnier is now represented by the Scotch limmer. There is the Celtic lag ; they remain last for lag, p. xii. Among the new Romance words are picture, brutal, formal (in dress), the rest (reliqui). We find the French phrase, a bone viage ; a favourite wish all through this Century. There is the phrase courting, p.

xvi. ; this means here "frequenting the Court." There are the new phrases let it pass, grate (rub), goodly appointed (equipped), also to apply business, our ply. Gower's des-traught is now changed to distract; thy wit is distract, p. xxx. ; the Latin forms were beginning to encroach. The verb surmise now means ingere. The verb depart gets the new sense of mori, p. li. The word sect had hitherto been connected with religion ; it now means simply genus ; men of this sect, p. lii. ; hence comes our noun set, as "a set of fellows." There is the new phrase from post unto pillar tossed, p. lvii. ; post at this time might mean columna, as in the 'Ayenbite.' Beale (Bell) appears as a woman's name. Barclay was always fond of adding the ness to foreign roots, as quietness.

There is the old saying, they robbe St. Peter to cloth St. Paul, p. xvii. ; the early occurrence of this phrase shows that the derivation of it, as usually given, is wrong.

There is a treatise on Carving, printed by Wynkyn de Worde, dating from 1514 ; this is contained in the 'Babees' Book.' Here we find a peculiar verb for each bird or beast that is carved, thus you wynge a partridge, but thye a woodcock, p. 265 ; bread must be squared (proportioned), p. 269 ; to square a man in our day means to "adjust him to your purpose." Our Scriptural sense of rebuke comes out very plain in p. 286 ; it is no rebuke (opprobrium) to a knight to entertain a King's groom.

In Halliwell's 'Letters of the Kings of England,' from 1513 to 1525, we see the substantive the Englishery. In p. 280 Henry VIII. says that certain things may stand meetly well for a shift ; here the last word is like turn in "it will serve your turn." There is the Adjective towardly, where the last syllable is something new. Two Genitive Pronouns are coupled in your and their return, p. 278. There are the verbs come in (submit), take such order that, etc. We read that an army scaled (dispersed) ; perhaps this is the phrase of some Northern secretary of Henry's, p. 283. Among the Romance words are harkebuss (spelt with the h). There is facilely employed for easily, p. 284 ; a fine phrase, for which Foxe, many years afterwards, laughed at Wolsey. In p. 246 the foreign dis is preferred to our homeborn mis in distrust.

In Ellis' 'Letters,' from 1513 to 1525, we see the Scotch laird written lard; there is also the Scotch Sinkler for St. Clair. Warham, following the new usage, writes father, Series iii., vol. i. p. 241. A well-known change is illustrated when Madrill replaces Madrid. We see the betterer, where there is one syllable too much. The Salopian won (unus) is now adopted in London. I may remark on the long despatch sent from Toledo in 1525 by Sampson and Tunstall (Series iii., vol. ii. p. 20); the former writes in the Southern dialect; the latter, who, being a Northern man, has evidently taken pains to learn good English, writes much as we do.

There are the new Substantives lance knight, blacksmith. We hear of the Popis Holines; Wolsey, when but a bishop, is styled your Grace; in a letter from Newcastle occurs the phrase a man of Churche (clericus); holy had hitherto come before Churche. In Series iii., vol. i. p. 190, John Rightwise appears, who compiled the 'Propria quæ maribus' and 'As in præsentî,' works well known to the youth of my generation, though now obsolete. We see at good length (for a long while); fires, not bonfires, are kindled for the victory of Pavia. We have the Plural logings, I think for the first time. There is the phrase they are in lust, p. 169; here the noun changes from voluptas to salus, and determines the prevailing sense in our modern lusty. In make busines (Series iii., vol. ii. p. 32) the noun adds the sense of turbatio to the old negotium; an actor on the stage talks of his business (stir). We read of the drafte of a proclamation.

There is the phrase two thousand crowns and odde, p. 318, where the Adjective gets the new meaning of amplius. Dunbar's new form tryme (pulcher) appears in the South. Leo X., we are told, looked losty (sanus) just before his death. A matter is said to be freshe in memory. Our usual legal epithet appears, his learned counsail. There is a curious late instance of the Teutonic Adjective agreeing with the Substantive in number, smalz horsis, p. 206. Further on we have be so good to gyve; then the as is inserted, be so gratiose as to remember. There are phrases like to the best of my power, the deaneries be nothing like to that value; this last is Warham's. In it is not the wey to lede him; the word right is dropped before the noun; we saw a hundred years earlier he was the man.

As to the Pronouns, we find the prefixed to no, followed by an Adjective, to the no little perell. There is ony wey (in any direction).

As to the Verbs, a new idiom for the Future Participle is struck off; about, prefixed to the Infinitive, had hitherto expressed intense earnestness; it seems now to be softened into the bare Future, he is about to ship goods (Series ii., vol. ii. p. 295). There are phrases like she was brought to bed of a child, make report of himself, geve notise, put me in his wylle (testament), bring to pass, take harte, he is forth comyng, take breath, wrest the matter, he thought it best to, etc., not reckoning that, etc., as matters stood, have a good mynde to serve. The old noun cloke gives birth to a verb, to clooke perjurie. There is the phrase to saye the truthe. The old overrun (beat in running) was now being replaced by Chaucer's outrun; the former verb is here used in another sense, overrun the country.

Among the new Adverbs are at the soneste (soonest), far behindhand, the tyme is ferr spent, from 20 pounds upwards. The neither, followed by another neither, as in our Bible, may be found in p. 110. There is the Northern form whensomever.

Among the Prepositions stand upon suspicion, nigh upon a thousand, where some such word as bordering is understood. The for had always expressed quod spectat ad; we now see she is merry for a woman being in her case, p. 145. Warham has behyyther the sea and beyond, showing how be was always used to form new Prepositions.

Henry VIII., when surprised, cries by the masse (Series iii., vol. i. p. 196); this was to become a common oath all through the Century. There is the Dutch dock (for ships) and the Scandinavian haulzers.

Among the new Romance words are familiar with, Maister Secretary, the Popis Nuntio, the Master of the Cere- monyas (at Rome), scrutiny (at the Pope's election), the particulars, broilery, occurrantes, money matters, successes, agent, dandiprat (a coin), join with them, be in good train, tenable, a lege (league) distant, enterveue, to state something, of no importance, to couch a letter, to pen things, a sure man, peces of ordinance, a precedent, I assure you, they (soldiers) have served, my bill (note of hand), blanks, to sport (joke), to interteign (guests), precislye, in the same predicament (plight), devyse (heraldic), suer I am that, etc., their superiors, successyvely, to intimate (proclaim), repeat, by faire meanes, move to teris, doagier (dowager). We see the phrase their powers (vires); then comes the powaris (states) of Italye. The raskells stand for the commons, p. 192; hence Knox was not foulmouthed when he spoke of the rascal multitude forty years later. A rascall, p. 301, is a camp follower, distinguished from a soldier. We see diffidence in the sense of mistrust; Bunyan couples the word (employing it as unbelief) with despair. In p. 177 stands give him good lessons (warnings); we still say, "a good lesson for you." We read of six couple, where the foreign word is both Singular and Plural, like yoke and swine. In p. 328 a certain Order is called The Religion; the word was to bear a very different sense in France forty years later. There is a curious idiom in this, the lordes were attempted to be won. We have the phrase to remembre (reward) labors with promotion; hence the "remember the coachman" of our boyhood. The old every other line now becomes every second line. We have an attempt at Latin forms in fructfull, forfect, and appoint; there is also streictnes; we may talk both of the strait gate and of a strict master, the French and the Latin. Warham says of the Kentish taxpayers that they band and promise; the first verb is formed from the noun. The Cura is well known in Spain; the English ambassadors at Madrid speak of him as the curate, a word which down to this time could well express the Spanish title.

In Bishop Fisher's sermon against Luther, in 1521 (Early English Text Society), he uses the old Salopian phrase fell wyttes, p. 341; fell, like sharp and shrewd, seems to hover between crudelis and acer; Lady Nairne has he's a fell clever lad. The new verb sklaunt (slant) is formed from the old adverb, p. 323. We hear that Luther calls the Pope's abettors papistas; this is perhaps the first appearance of the word in England.

In the 'State Papers,' from 1513 to 1525, we find Wolsey often using the phrase "he has more strings to his bow." Norfolk writes, vol. iv. p. 85, "now the iron is hote, it is tyme to stryke."

As to Vowels, a was more and more sliding into the sound of French ê; we see prepaire, cais; the French Rouen is written Roone (otherwise called here Rowayn), iv. 413. A well-known German city is called Mayaunce, not Mentz. The Scotch family Ker is written Carre, a form afterwards preferred by Sir Walter in his poetry. The terwin (fatigare) of the 'Promptorium' now appears as tire. The French seem still in some cases to have sounded their eau like iou, for Bewren is here written for the foreign Beurain, vi. 66; on the other hand, Beaugency appears as Bogeansye, vi. 62. Their au seems at Paris to have been now sliding from ou to o; the well-known Lautrec appears in English correspondence both as Lowtreke and Lottryke, vi. 58, 94.

As to Consonants, the p is inserted in Tompson; the o is cut down to a, as 8 a klok; the v is struck out in Caundishe (Cavendish). The t is added, the old margin becomes mergent, iv. 12. Even at this date we find Surrey writing Meurus for Melrose, iv. 29. The n replaces r, for the old herberger becomes arbinger, ii. 115; heriot and harbinger are the only two words that still keep any trace of the old here (exercitus). The Scotch Angus is constantly written Anguish about this time.

Among the Substantives we remark kyp (keep of a castle), the breke of the day. There are phrases like gonne shotte; ladde and lasse are coupled. The word crew is still used of soldiers, not of sailors. We read of Swycelande and the Swysschirs, being compounds of French and German forms, also of the Lowe Cuntreyes, the Indias (Spanish America), and the syster of Portingale (the King). Wolsey talks of Henry as the Kinges Highnes, but calls Charles His Majesty, vi. 268. We see main recovering some of the Adjectival force that had belonged to it before the Conquest; there is his mayne (chief) power, vi. 115. We have the forms nonlikelihode, now is the tyme to, etc., I have noo busynes to do therein (it is no affair of mine). The old future phrase upon the point had been followed by the Infinitive; it now takes a Verbal Noun, upon the pointe of departing, iv. 320.

Among the Adjectives sad still expresses gravis; there is deadly fead (feud), also doo my best, iv. 37, where a substantive is dropped.

Among the Pronouns we see all and singular.

As to the Verbs, we are struck by Wolsey's phrase, I wil be lothe to, etc., vi. 332; Ipswich seems to have followed Manning in his unusual use of the shall and will. Both should and would make way for a new rival in we coude be content that, etc., ii. 89. There is a great innovation borrowed from the French in iv. 7; in 1523 Surrey writes he having broken; this new Participle is used two years later by King Henry; it must have been of use in Englishing the Greek Aorist Participle; the study of Greek had now just begun in England. There is the curious the moone being waned; Surrey uses the phrase, at that time 330 years old, he shall maye spare (poterit parcere) almost for the last time. There are phrases like make difficulte, run a ship agrounde, take a fantasye to, keep his residence, give the chace unto, reckon to have it, make approches and batry (in a siege), geve you fair wordis, set a good face as (if) I will goo, shew his visage. Wolsey is fond of making ripe a verb, in the sense of docere; he often uses the Northern scale (to separate). A merchant in our days would shudder if he found his clerk making a book; but this phrase is used, iv. 66, for casting up accounts. In vi. 50 stands I wolde not wysche itt to a dogge; here to be given is dropped before the preposition. The old verb worth (fieri) had all but departed; we see the new he torned Frenche, vi. 64. There is a curious Present Participle in iv. 32, I shall be doing; but perhaps in is dropped before the last word.

Among the Adverbs tandem is Englished by at length, vi. 197. The Double Negative is all but laid aside in these State Papers. Wolsey writes, in vi. 225, first, . . . secondely, and so on to sixthly; he knew nothing of firstly; the ly added to Numerals is new. We find so prefixed to a Verbal Noun, hys so doynge shall be, etc., i. 83.

As to Prepositions, tree upon tree had long been known; where the upon has the meaning of the Latin post; we now see sepe upon the matter, i. 3. The new idiom connected with for once more appears in iv. 280, he is man of great substance for these partes; the old translation of for, quod spectat ad, is present here.

Among the Romance words are in the lieu and place of, Vice Admyral, pasport, in no case, mutenary (mutiny), prevent (forestall), something like this appeared in 1470; a gratuite (pleasure), to marshe (march), munityon (ammunition), sense (meaning), be frank and open, a postscripta (Wolsey's word), he is obliged unto us, take her congie of him, platform, rampaire, fawsbraye, chek accompts, apply (lean) to. Latin is sometimes preferred to the French form; thus there is Pace's recuse for the usual refuse (recusant was to come rather later); traduction stands for delivery. Wolsey often writes subdainly, with the Latin subitus in his head; he is fond of doulce (dulcis). He writes pickande for the French piquant; this may be a leaning to the old East Midland Active Participle; the Teutonic and Latin forms of the old Aryan word are confused. We see to tot and marcke (names in a bill), i. 115; a curious verb to be derived from totus. Queen Margaret talks of a brak (brig) which came from brigantine, iv. 262. Kildare opposes the word humanities to crueltie; the former had before this time expressed merely courtesy. In vi. 317 we hear of an expresse curror; the adjective was later turned into a substantive. In p. 370 stands what people (a set) of Consaillours he hathe. The word prise now gains the new meaning of navis capta, iv. 89. The word diseas is applied to so slight a thing as a cold, iv. 236. We see simulate, to which Lord Macaulay preferred the later verb sham. The word half had long been used before adverbs; we now have ryde a quarter so farre, vi. 88. We hear of capitaine Bayard, vi. 192; I think the first instance of this noun as a title in English. A lawyer at Rome appears as Maister Doctor Hanibal (Annibaldi), foreshadowing Dogberry's Master Gentleman Conrad. Wolsey uses catail in the Northern, not in the Southern, sense of the word; with him it is pecus, vi. 173; the old haveour (substance) appears once more, p. 185; basse is often coupled with low; Wolsey uses both the verbs depeche and dispatch. In vi. 513 we have to stay (delay) a thing. Wolsey now and then uses except for nisi.

In Halliwell's 'Royal Letters' (1513-1525) we may study the words of King Henry VIII. He talks of free wills, in the Plural, p. 233; also of the Englishery and Irishery, p. 253, the former referring to the Pale. The Verb is dropped in no more to you at this time, p. 235; there is we can do no less, but, etc., set in good train, a city holds against enemies, p. 279; we should say holds out. The verb grow is followed by to, as well as into; Henry tells his sister, you be grown to much wealth, p. 275. About this time the rightful Nominative ye was much set aside in favour of you. Among the Romance words are furniture (also furnishment), certificate (warning), exorbitant, affiance, offers, exploit, comminations, affectionate. Henry deputes a Bishop to be resident "as our orator" at Rome, p. 235; we have now made this resident a substantive. He talks of the renovelling of authority, p. 243; perhaps this led the way to our form renewal. The word personage is often used as implying something nobler than person. The old conclude makes way for "we have resolved and determined that," etc., p. 284; in p. 245 we read of well-determined (disposed) persons; we now talk of a determined man; Henry speaks of himself as being determinate resolved, p. 246. He writes of his having received instructions from a Deputy, p. 248; we should now apply this word to the orders of a Superior alone. Irish soldiers are said to be extreme in demanding wages; their land is to be reduced to civility, p. 253.

Mrs. Wood, in her 'Letters of Illustrious Ladies,' has printed many letters of the two sisters of Henry VIII., ranging from 1513 to 1525. Queen Margaret has by this time become unmistakably Scotch in her speech ; she uses the preposition fore-against (the old foran ongean), p. 167, and contracts this into forments, p. 257. She misplaces her shalls and wills ; she uses while as usque ad, whiles for aliquando, suppose for si ; she discards the old liflod for living, and writes foregather, unfriends, aye (semper). In p. 248 she talks of the westland Lords, where an Englishman would have written West country.

Among the Substantives are stop (hindrance), small pox ; Queen Mary complains of suffering from the disease called the mother (globus hystericus), a word found also in Dutch ; this afterwards occurs in Shakespere ; in the year 1280 bimodered had been used for agitatus ; " I am moithered " stands in 'Silas Marner.' Queen Margaret constantly uses stead for service, as " do him stead," which is uncommon ; hence came the later stand in stead. She often uses way and ways for will, policy, interest, or faction, as in p. 266, " get them at his way," " if I go his way ;" she employs way in two senses in one sentence, p. 278, " by any ways I would they left the governor's ways." Hence our " get his own way." Lady Oxford thanks Wolsey for his gracious goodness, p. 334 ; the Substantive was coming in once more ; she promises her good will to a dependent, who asks for an office, p. 335.

Among the Adjectives are motherly, winning ; the last is applied to Queen Mary of France, p. 174. There is the Scotch form cumbersome (molestus), just as we now hear hindbersome in the North ; cumbrous was set apart for another shade of meaning. We see well-minded, p. 324, with the Past Participle ending ; this minded was beginning to be much used in composition about this time. In p. 287 alike is used like the old all one ; " it is alike to both, where," etc. In p. 168 lifelike, applied to young James V. by his mother, keeps its old meaning, vivax. In p. 201 Queen Mary says that she must be short with young Brandon ; that is, in announcing her projects.

Among the Verbs we see put to the proof, strike money, he wills me evil. The Passive voice is developed, I am (evil) done to stands in p. 228. The verb get is used like have, since it is followed by a Passive Participle; I get no good done, p. 269. Queen Margaret often talks of being answered (satisfied) as to the money due to her; we say that a thing answers our expectations. She complains, in p. 230, that her husband took up her revenues; this phrase for appropriating lingers in our "taking up room." In p. 326 she uses forward as a transitive verb, and starts the new verb overlook (negligere). She talks of naming benefices to sundry persons, p. 301; we now nominate persons to benefices.

Among the Prepositions we remark upon the word of a prince, p. 190. The old being on life (not alive) is used by Queen Catherine in p. 260. There is to the best of his power, to the uttermost; Queen Margaret says that she is allowed to enter to her children; hence our stage direction, enter to him the Duke. We have already seen make for a purpose; men now go for favour; we should in our day place in before for.

Among the Romance words are comforts (pleasures) in the Plural, consternation, justify (make good), quarterly (the Adverb), memorial (scriptum), redound to. A letter is sent by the post, p. 163, that is, the rider. In p. 315 a letter is despatched without direction to any person. We talk of Her Majesty's Opposition; so Queen Margaret writes in p. 169 about my party adversary. The word trouble is much softened, meaning little more than petere; I shall trouble you for money, as Queen Margaret writes, p. 221. The word sort is used for sense in p. 316; a letter, in contrary sort, is sent; in some sort is a well-known phrase. Queen Margaret complains in p. 328 of being not well disposed; the word here refers to the body, not the mind; when the word is coupled with ill, it must, in our day, refer to the mind alone, which is curious. She often uses sober where we should employ moderate. The title Sire is used by Queen Mary when addressing her brother; Queen Catherine is addressed as right excellent, right high and mighty princess. Margaret writes, pray your Grace to pardon me, dropping the I, p. 327; she probably confused this phrase with please your Grace, which comes in the next page; the first quotation gives the clue to prithce. She writes in the middle of a sentence, and most suspicion of all; this is short for "most cause for suspicion." Wolsey uses the participle incholered, thus giving a Greek form to the French colère (ira), a form which we retain, p. 197. There are the phrases you fail to him, and failing that; Margaret uses the verb disassent, p. 300, the first hint of our dissent. She talks of being at mal aise (ill); and her sister uses dote as well as the old dower.

In the documents quoted by Foxe, ranging between 1513 and 1525 (Cattley's Edition, iv.), we remark that one heretic is accused of saying that Luther had more learning in his little finger than all the doctors in England in their whole bodies, p. 179; in p. 237 comes the saw, "it is good to be merry and wise." The Christian name Allan is written Allen, p. 195; and there is the surname Simondes, p. 191, coming from Simon, Simound, like sermon, sermonde. There is the new substantive a stump foot. We see business with its new sense of turmoil; make all this business, iv. 226. The heretics (it is our last glimpse of the old Lollards) called themselves known men or just-fast-men, p. 218, also good fellows, p. 243.¹

Among the Adjectives are to sit mum, ripe in Scripture. Among the Verbs we see turn a penny, to storm, "ye be cast away and undone," p. 192, whence a new noun was soon to be coined; the verb in this sense was often used about this time. The verb fret is used, not of the mind as formerly, but of the skin, in describing poor Hunne's death. A man makes good cheer (has a jolly time), p. 192; this differs from the earlier "she made me good cheer." In the next page a horse is besweat and bemired; we were to become very fond of prefixing this be to verbs; so General Butler wrote of the New Orleans ladies as "bejewelled and becrinolined." A child is at nurse, p. 183, suggested by the Latin apud. The word Maister had long been prefixed to surnames; in p. 239 we hear of Maistress Cotismore; we now contract the word into Missus. A criminal is examined before a bishop; heretics are detected (informed against) to the bishop's office, p. 223 ; this last word is well known in connexion with the Holy Office. The Northern kirkmen, applied to the clergy, becomes churchmen in the South, iv. 224.

Many of Skelton's poems belong to the time between 1513 and 1525. We see the proverbs, all is fysshe that cometh to net, nedes must he rin that the devyll dryvith. He has puns on the words raisin, seal, and others ; he is fond of prefixing the French en. Like Dunbar, he has an unbounded admiration for Chaucer, Gower, and Lydgate, and plainly puts them all upon one level ; see ii. 185. He has the old words and forms, sum dele, eysell, helas, wanhope, to grame, to wed (pledge), to fong. He mimics the Northern dialect in his ge heme (gae hame), addressed to a Scot, ii. 280.

Skelton, unlike the author of the 'Candlemas Play,' makes a difference between the French blew (cæruleus) and the Teutonic blo (lividus). Like Macaulay, he uses Lewes for the French Louis. He turns the mange of Piers Ploughman into monche, our munch. He turns v into f, for the old snuwen (anhelare) becomes snuwf. The old d is replaced by g, heder moder becomes hugger mugger. The ch is replaced by j, the old cearcian (stridere) appears in out of joynt ye jar, ii. 334 ; the last word was much favoured by Heywood. The th is added, for there are the two forms commune well and commune welth, Barclay's new form.

As to new Substantives, we have mamockes (fragmenta), a jackenapes, shyttel cocke, a webbe of lylse wulse, ii. 281 ; this last is a pun on the Cardinal's name. There is a yonkerkyn, i. 233, from the Dutch. Skelton still uses the term Lollardy, i. 241, of which he was no lover ; the Lollard was soon to be replaced by the Gospeller. There are the phrases Jacke shall have Gyl, ii. 16, sober sadnesse (gravitas), Pers Pykthanke, a term of abuse, ii. 60. Wolsey is called a gracelesse elfe, ii. 314, showing a change in the meaning of the Substantive ; he is also such a Bedleme, ii. 297, a new use of the such. We see an ende of an old song. When we come across the form negarshyp we understand why the Irish call a niggard "an ould nagur." There is the new phrase he is at suche takynge, ii. 308 ; we should say, "in such a taking." The old wittol (sciens), in the guise of a wetewold, is now first used in its evil sense, ii. 178.¹ In the same page is another term of abuse, a noughty pack, which perhaps here refers to a man; baggage was later applied to women.

The new Adjectives are upstart, pynk iyde. We see cock sure, ii. 286. The word praty gets the new meaning of fortis; quyte you like praty men, ii. 33. In touch you on the quyke, ii. 76, a substantive is dropped after the adjective. The wonder had long stood before adjectives, as wonderblithe; it is now prefixed to a substantive, ye be wonders men, ii. 7; a slight transposition of this gave birth to the new wondrous. There is our phrase, trewe as the gospell, ii. 321; here Manning had used sop as the first word.

The impersonal it is much used after Verbs, as to fote it. We see not a whit, ii. 219, expressing the Old English nawiht (naught).

Among the new Verbs is mysname (vituperare). There are the phrases blowen with the flye of heresy, also fly blowen opinions, i. 234, chop logyk, take your pleasure, thou be hanged! ii. 86, kepe the wolfe from the dore, know what ys a clocke, ii. 132, he knew what was what, ii. 313, have a smacke of (resemblance to), play didil diddil, ii. 203, I did what I coude, it erkith me, to cast a fole, do us a shrewd turn. We see the phrase to pop forth saws, i. 238; at p. 235 poppyng means babbling; our pop still implies noise, as pop-gun. The verb blother, our blather, answers to the Latin blaterare, ii. 49. The old fall on prechyng (so it once was written) loses its preposition in ii. 101, and thus the Verbal Noun is made to look like a Participle. The Northern scalp has at last made its way to London. There is the new compound rayne-beten, ii. 104.

As to Adverbs, the so is employed as an asseveration, as in Tyndale, I can do mastryes, so I can, ii. 56.

There is write at lengthe, ii. 185, where some adjective such as full seems to be dropped after at; we also have to prate after this rate, ii. 165; we should now substitute at.

Among the Interjections is boho! a cry of derision. There are also the Shakesperian bowns, the Yorkshire tushe; hem, Syr, ii. 12 (Shallow's hem, boys!), by our lakyn (ladykin), alarum! out harowe! ii. 112. We have the cry of birds, jug jug, chuk chuk. St. Mary of Egypt supplied the oath by Mary Gipy, ii. 235 (Marry gup). The Devil's name is often brought into Skelton's comedy; there is also what, a very vengeaunce, who is that? ii. 100. In ii. 180 stands to blow a bararag (a noise), whence ballyrag.

There are the Scandinavian nouns blurre, trash, and the verb whysk, also go gingerly.

Among the Romance words are conveyance (thieving), ii. 25, tenter hokys, a budge furre (lamb's wool), mynyon, bybyll clarke, musty, trotters (sheep's feet), carbuckyls (warts); the grapeys of 1430 becomes graundePOSE, leading up to our grampus. There is the phrase grese my hands with gold. The Northern form catell is used for bestia, ii. 54; may-stresse now means amica as well as domina, ii. 73. The verb intrete adds the sense of precari to that of tractare, ii. 75. To trusse a packe expresses abire, ii. 84; hence our "send him packing," "pack off." In ii. 93 Adversity says that she is Goddys preposytour; she remarks as to careless lords, I prynt them with a pen; the prepostors at Eton may still be viewed, marking down the names of culprits at the master's behest. We have seen passing strange used for nearly 200 years; the participle is now changed, and we find so excedynge farre, ii. 110; this form was adopted by Tyndale. In ii. 147 polytykes expresses state craft, a most curious use of the Plural. Terence is called a comicar, ii. 185; the Teutonic ending er must perforce assert itself. Wolsey is called an epycure, ii. 274. Skelton used the old fors, where Tyndale employed the later matter; make no great fors, ii. 330.

In vol. xx. of the Percy Society may be found the two versions of the old Song of the Lady Bessy (the Queen of Henry VII.) The second of them may date from about 1520, when the great events of 1485 were becoming somewhat legendary; the first of the versions is more modern still. The poet must have been a Cheshire or Lancashire man; he uses whome for home, p. 75; there is the old faxe (cæsaries), which was now not known to the South of Lichfield. A man in disgrace comes under a clowde, p. 79; we now first hear of read coates, Lord Stanley's soldiers, p. 74; a well-known word in Cromwell's day, 130 years later. We here see that Lancashire is included in "the West country." There is the new phrase lyke a man will I die, p. 77. Among the verbs are where standeth the wynde? p. 70. We talk of backing a horse; we here find to back (repellere) enemies, p. 45. In the same page men give white hoods; that is, bear for their cognisance; this is a favourite phrase of the Century, and is used by Mrs. Thrale about 1790. Men are ready in an houres warnyng; here we substitute at. There is assuredlye, used also by Fisher.

Many poems in Hazlitt's Collection (vols. ii. and iv.) seem to date from 1520. There are the very old forms tho (tunc), go on live (alive), iv. 221, and molde is still used for terra, p. 191, swayne for servus, p. 204. But there is the great contraction werte for were it, p. 208.

Among the Substantives there is toy (antic). An admiring woman calls a stalwart youth a whypper, p. 94; in our day she would use whopper or whacker.

Among the Adjectives is the old quever (impiger) of 1220, first seen in the 'Ancren Riwle.' The byrchen rod is mentioned in iv. 218. There are the new forms faced and tonged, p. 88.

As to Pronouns, a man brings his wife to this, p. 225; later in the Century pass would have been added.

Among the Verbs are show his mind to, bere the breche (in wedlock), nothing commes amyssse, tell where to tourne me, keep house, beare a rule, have in store for, set up his shop, play the devell, let flee at him (with no Accusative, p. 209). The be was prefixed to form Verbs all through this Century; begyft them stands in p. 196. The verb sway had been Transitive hitherto; it now becomes intransitive, being used of a body hanging, p. 94. The verb take now gets the new sense of ferire; take him on the cheek, p. 181. The old trim (firmare) is used ironically, a wife threatens to trim her husband, p. 209.

We see the new ones for all, iv. 91, soon to be used by Tyndale.

There is the proverb selfe doe, self have, p. 194, implying that a man creates his own fate.

There is lob, akin to the German, used of a clown, p. 205; it was afterwards used by Shakespere.

Among the Romance words is turn a penny; there is the phrase double quycke, p. 85, whence comes a verb much used in our army. In p. 95 a man dying tourns his heels up; we here substitute toes for heels. There is the noun checkemate, p. 88; here a pun is intended, for there is a hit at a husband.

One of the Coventry Mysteries, the 'Assumption,' p. 383, differing in style from the rest, is attributed by the editor to a hand of Henry the Eighth's time. We may consider it as dating from about the year 1520; the play cannot well be later, for it abounds in old forms and words, soon to vanish for ever, from the South. Such are beth, let se, hende, to nyhyn (accedere), quyche (quod), into (usque ad), brether, kend (genus), fer (ignis), postel (apostolus), lare (docere), tho (tunc), ble (color), in fere, gramly (graviter), flum Jordan; out, harrow! belave (manere), berde (mulier), queme (placere), clepe, to spelle of me, Sovereins (domini), injoye (gaudere). The piece cannot well be earlier than 1520, for we find Roye's new phrase fy on you! also, it is like you to do it, p. 394. There is curyng for covering, p. 392; g replaces b, as glaberis (garruli), p. 396; the two forms wach and wake (we are on the Great Sundering Line for the last time) are coupled in p. 388, as in the year 1220; mayde is still applied to a man, as mayde John, p. 389, like Drayton's maiden knight; there is sneveler used in scorn, p. 396. In p. 385 senster, which was to last all through this Century, is applied to the Virgin, and seems to be a compound of sempstress and spinster. In p. 400 she and the angels address their risen Lord with the you. In p. 395 stands what noyse is alle this?

Among the Verbs we see Skelton's phrase flies blowe hem, p. 384. We have seen "considering thy youth;" we now find a new Participial phrase in p. 387; my name is gret, treuly you telland, like our "speaking roughly," for "to speak roughly." The will is used in the Northern sense (oportet) in p. 395; I am aferd there wylle be sumthymg amys. The at is prefixed to Numerals to express age; at fourteen yer, p. 383. There is the Dutch word ogyl; my heart begins to ogyl and quake, p. 395; we have now restored the verb to its proper sense, showing connexion with the eye, eage, ooge. The new Romance words are expire (mori), demon, terrestrial; the Virgin speaks of her sympil soule, p. 388. The old system is still in vogue of identical words riming, if they express different ideas; for in p. 388 hende (prope) rimes with hende (mansuetus).

A 'Northern Mystery,' printed in 'Reliquiæ Antiquæ,' ii. 124, perhaps a Yorkshire composition, seems to belong to this time; it has some new words in common with Skelton and Coverdale; for instance, wonderoslye is something new; also gross and far hence. The e is inserted in piteous, as before in hidous. The Northern habit of turning a into e, which dates from the year 680, is seen in p. 142, where alas becomes ales! the old joyful is sounded joeful, p. 158; the quickly of the South becomes whiklye, p. 134. We see sho (illa), a very late instance. The verb start is sliding into proficisci; St. John, when leaving, says, now farwell, for a starte. There is a curious ungrammatical change in an Auxiliary verb; in p. 126 a man is asked, was ye present? the ye and thou are here confounded; the was was used in this way down to 1831.¹ The use of but (quin) is continued, was ther none othere meyn but þou must die? this idiom is used by Tyndale. In p. 141 comes run in loss, like the former run in dette. In p. 156 stands she myndes (recordatur) his obedience; the verb used in this sense has by this time, 1520, become purely Northern, though it had appeared in the 'Ayenbite'; there is also gar (facere). There are the Romance words dolorous, to entone. The word speculation stands for spectaculum in p. 151; it has been since much debased. The word progress is used for peregrinatio in p. 133; this was the sense in which Queen Elizabeth used it. So thoroughly adopted had gramercy been, that it stands for gratitude in p. 133. We see exeunt used as a stage direction. There is what myn harte is hevry! this old French idiom reminds us of the 'Cursor Mundi.'

In another piece of this time, i. 239, we light on the new verb cuddle, coming from cuplic (familiaris), also on the shopman's cry, maysters, what do you lack?

Some plays in 'Dodsley's Collection' (Hazlitt's edition) belong to 1520 or so; these are The Four Elements, Calisto, Everyman, Hickscorner, the Pardoner and Friar. The initial a is clipped, for we see peach (appeach) men of treason, p. 157; Peachum was to come 200 years later. The a stands for he, as quotha. The n is prefixed, as Nell; we have seen Nan before. The old lobi seems to give birth to lubber. A certain weapon is now called a hanger. The word girl seems from this time to mean nothing but puella, dropping its masculine meaning. Men are called lusty bloods, p. 43, a new sense of the substantive, coming from Holland. The word pin is used for crus; run on my pins, p. 181. There is a phrase often used in this Century, it is a world to see how, etc., p. 35. Among the Adjectives are prick-eared-cur, p. 87; also a peevish prick-eared song, p. 48; an epithet afterwards often applied to the Puritans. We see I have foul scorn of thee, p. 55; the phrase afterwards used by Elizabeth concerning Parma; a girl is called bouncing Bess.

Among the Verbs is the frequent expletive I say, also cross out this, set him fast by the heels, I have been about your business, p. 56; we have already seen I have been and procured.

There is the Prepositional compound their upbringing, and in the same page, 91, bringers up of youth; a great falling off. We see the phrase at a pinch. Among the Interjections is by Jis! In p. 74 stands now mum, now hem, expressing first silence, then utterance; we know the Shakesperian hem, boys!

Among the Romance words are centre, zenith, the Rase, where men are drowned. We hear of sack (the wine);

there is the verb frisk; and convey, the genteel word for thieving. The sans begins to be much used; we here have sans peer.

In Hazlitt, iv. 105, the 'Schole House of Women' must date from about 1520; we see prattle, p. 129 (soon to be used by Latimer), formed from prate. The French saunce is once more used, saunce remedy, p. 139.

In Almondbury Church, Yorkshire, there is a long inscription of 1522 carved in oak. Here we see pray the, our prithie, with no I preceding. See the 'Almondbury Glossary' (English Dialect Society).

In the same year (Collier's 'Dramatic Poetry,' i. 91) we hear of morys pykes, of a vydor, and of the Lord of Myrrule. Antony is cut down to Tonny, p. 91.

We must now consider the Romaunt of the Rose.¹ My view of this poem is that about the year 1520 some Northern bard of great genius steeped himself in the Chaucer 'Tales,' printed not long before, that he, moreover, studied manuscripts of Piers Ploughman, and perhaps Hampole, and that he then translated the renowned French poem. So cunningly did he imitate the old style, so skilfully did he do his work, that he has deceived all mankind for the last 350 years. Mr. Skeat having discussed the poem in his Chaucer's 'Prioresses Tale,' p. lxxxiii., I need not waste time in proving that the translator was a Northern man; he talks of shearing corn, p. 129; and also of condise (conduits), p. 43, still a Scotch phrase. There are here certain words and changes in meaning that did not appear until 1500, or later, such as solein (in the new sense of morose), knop (in the new sense of bud), run down his fame, to foot (saltare), valour (in the new sense of worth), friend in Court, poorly, win a name, feed eyes on him, take a nap, set it on end, no woman alive, well favoured. We see the beginning of a corruption widely prevalent in this Century, the to (dis) had ceased to be used in composition by Northern bards since 1480, though this practice, in the old correct sense, lingered on in the South until 1530; our present poet knows nothing of the true force of the to following all, but he sets down thy bloud shall all to quake, p. 76; a corruption of Mallory's that would have astonished any Southern writer between Chaucer and Tyndale. In the Romaunt we find wondersly (mirè), p. 88, a form that did not appear till 1490. The following are poor attempts to imitate Old English:—of one and other (of different people), p. 61, I wondred me (miratus sum), p. 23, her seemed (visa est), p. 7, for pure wood (furor), p. 9, doen, not don (facere), p. 29, durst trespace to her, p. 31, I marvaile thee asking this, p. 62, it is goe (gone), p. 73, fore (faren, that is, travelled), p. 81, my unease, p. 78, without halfen dole (without halving it), p. 71. There is the peculiar Salopian loteby (paramour), which I suspect came to the poet through Piers Ploughman, much as youthede (juventus) came to him through the Prick of Conscience; this last form he imitated in his fairehede, semlyhede. The old ealdien had meant senescere, and is so used by Wickliffe; the word had gone out; our translator found it in some old manuscript, and in his bungling way makes it transitive; time eldeth kinges, p. 12. This translation is much later than the Fourteenth Century; the proof is that in any poem of Chaucer's time the Teutonic words now obsolete are to the whole as one to twenty-five, counting only the nouns, verbs, and adverbs; in the present poem the proportion of obsolete Teutonic is far less than this; the French words also are beyond the proportion used by Chaucer in descriptive poetry.

¹ I differ from Mr. Skeat, who attributes the Romaunt to Chaucer's age. I wish that the question could be well thrashed out, and that some new Bentley would try his hand upon this English counterpart to the Letters of Phalaris. I am quite willing to allow that the word test, used by me, may now and then fail. I have here employed the Aldine edition of Chaucer (Pickering); the Romaunt is in vol. iv.; the other Chaucer forgeries, which I notice, may be found here.

I may point out the use of Gibbe for a cat's name, p. 185; this was to become Shakesperian. In p. 175 stands the folk of hir leading (whom she led), a new idiom of Verbal Nouns. The Accusative you is often used for the rightful ye; this is one of the changes fully developed in the Sixteenth Century. There is the new he can daunten, he, p. 27; this repetition is seen later; we should put another can before the last he. The Genitive whose refers to ointment, p. 57, through whose vertue, etc. Thorns are sharp, mo than ynowe, p. 55, a new phrase. There is a new use of on in p. 154, lose her lore on me; here some word like bestowing must be understood before the on. Folk is on the dawnce, p. 30; hence the later on the spree, etc. There is the new verb spear; boots come on or off, p. 68; garments are y-wrought (worked) with flowers. In p. 133 men take her counsaile, speaking of a woman; here the verb expresses sequi; it may sometimes mean rogare. A most curious use of the Infinitive stands in p. 188, there is nought, but yeeld thee; we should insert for it after the nought, and put to before the last verb. There is an odd mixture of the Strong and Weak forms in I wext (crevi), p. 21. The verb open becomes intransitive; the gate opened, p. 126. There is a form of speech soon to be repeated by Latimer—

“For all yede out at one ear
That in that other she did lere” (p. 154).

Among new Romance phrases are castles in Spaine, p. 77, persaunt (piercing) eyen, p. 84, flouret. There is a new way of measuring.—

“About it was founded square
An hundred fadome on every side” (p. 124).

We should say shortly, “a hundred fathom square.”

So popular was Chaucer that more imitations of his style were brought out about this time. The first of these is the ‘Court of Love’ (Aldine Edition, Pickering, vol. vi.); this most smooth and musical poem seems to be due to a Northern man; there are the phrases I would be wo (mæstus), p. 131, take root, yon same, p. 169, thril, as well as thirl, p. 175. As to date, many words are later than Chaucer, as aged, to mock, and pretty, in the sense of formosus; primrose, desk, and redbreast; something is shapen hauthorn wise, p. 173; every fair (mulier), p. 141, take up a song, p. 174, a world of honour (much honour), p. 130, bay window, hourely, and timorous. There is Barclay’s courtly; Skelton’s a pretty man, pang, and robin redbreast; Roy’s to lene to love, p. 160; Coverdale’s cleanliness. The at is prefixed to Numerals to express age, as in the 'Coventry Mystery' of 1520; at eightene yere of age, p. 131. We see a w dropped in the middle of cokold; there is May day, dating from 1523, and key connected with music, p. 174; this last appears about 1530. We see high honour and overbold. Among the Verbs are I was put to mine oth, give her free the reine, renne (on) with your tung, better borne (natus). There is a very late form, heile to thee! p. 152; I doubt if one such example of this Preposition inserted can be found before 1500; the old form was heil be you (vobis). There is a new use of within; within (at) a word she came, p. 169; our within call shows a trace of this. Some of the Romance words seem to be very late comers; we have entituled, ornate, actuell, religiousity, appetite, musician, linnet, to tourn leaves, deserve to know. There is unto my judgement (sententia), p. 155; I think this sense of the word does not appear until 1500. The most modern phrase of all is in p. 152, a figge for all her chastity! I doubt if another instance of this can be found before 1560.

There are some passages in this poem worthy of Chaucer himself; see particularly the four stanzas, p. 169, that deal with the Vaunter boasting of his success with women. There is one place, p. 165, which sets before us monks and friars bewailing their hard lot of celibacy; they look with wistful eyes "unto these women, courtly, fresh, and shene." This is the Renaissance all over.

The 'Flower and the Leaf' is another imitation of Chaucer, compiled about 1520. This also is by a Northern bard; we see as I would wene, p. 252. The very (valdè) found only once, I think, before 1400, is now in constant use, and there is the rime ware for wered, p. 252; a change that was not made until 1450. There is hencheman, p. 252; the word first appears in the 'Promptorium'; and the ch did not come into it until 1511. There is ferre off, p. 250 (the old of feor), not found before Bishop Fisher; such like, not found before Tyndale; light grene, not found before Palsgrave; as it would seem, p. 251, not found before Joye. In p. 257 clothes are wringing wet (wet so as to need wringing), a most curious use of the Verbal noun;

I think no subsequent example of this appears until 1570. There is a blundering imitation of the Old in the following words: to avise hem (spectare), a totally wrong meaning, p. 250; ladies are to-brent, p. 255; a new coinage proving that the poet, coming from the North, knew not the force of to (dis) in composition. There is another odd phrase in p. 246, of an height by and by. A sentence of Udal's appears in p. 256, they n' ade o threed drie on them. There is the curious compound heavenly figured, p. 249.

The poem called 'Chaucer's Dream' is also due to the North, as we see by the words kirke and fortravailed in p. 216; the latter has been altered into fare travailed. There are many phrases and forms that date from after 1500, such as what a paine, p. 185, bagage (in the sense of impedimenta), p. 223, all the rest (reliqui), p. 238, I couth consent to, p. 239, make provision for, p. 221, wondrous, p. 233, undersail, p. 211, know what was what, p. 216. There is an absurd imitation of antiquity in the form kneene (genua), p. 186, which Chaucer never used (but there is an instance of this in Lydgate), so twin is used for venire, p. 185; a sense the old verb never bore. In p. 232 stands in lesse than an houre. A man may be wilde of countenance, p. 243. In p. 202 we have of one thyng ye may be sure. There is the new backward and forward, p. 211. Among the Romance words are dislodge, ray, in plaine English. In p. 205 conquest takes the new sense of conquered land. The verb pray in p. 218, following bid, takes the meaning of invitare, pray him to the feast. There is the new phrase appoint a day with her, p. 224.

In 1523 Fitzherbert brought out a book on Husbandry (English Dialect Society). It is a Northern piece; such words as flit, kye, ill (bad), hoyst (cough), shearer (reaper), hinder end, he is wo, and Dunbar's tedir, are found. The Old English sukt (morbus) still lingers on here as soughte, p. 54. Some think that the author belonged to the well-known Derbyshire family; he certainly dwells upon the poore housbande of the Peeke, p. 43. He replaces h by c, as hucbone (hucklebone) for Mallory's hoh bone. He inserts a second m to distinguish between dame and the damme (mater) of animals. He strikes out the w; the old wose becomes oyse, our ooze, p. 71.

Among the new Substantives are plough tail, belly band, grasier, hunger-rot, bloud-yren (lancet), devlappes, May day, aftermath, string halt, a quickset, hart of oke, underwood, sadelcloth, linseed, a ruff (in apparel). There is the compound cley-ground. Among the weeds named in p. 29 are handoddes; this may be Shakespere's hor-docks (see Mr. Skeat's note on this, p. xxx.) We read of the tethe of a rake, p. 33, the radel-marke of sheep, p. 50. The word hog is transferred from porcus to ovis; share-hogges, p. 50, are yearling sheep that have been once shorn. The word salesman, very different from seller, is connected with sales of wood, p. 86. In p. 97 female hempe is distinguished from churle hempe; this last is a late survival; a ceorl-catt was the old phrase for a Tom cat. The word game is used in two senses in p. 104; men play great game (high stakes), at a game; the former sense comes into "What's your game?" (purpose).

Among the Adjectives the ending in ed is much used; we see lose-skinned, broken-winded, an yren gray. A beginner in farming is called a yonge husbände; this is now an English surname; we read of stuyffe ground, men shere cleane, p. 29. The Northern tyred is now on its way to the South, p. 25; it is found in Palsgrave. There is a terse new phrase in p. 77, "these will double his rent or nyghe it;" here the it must represent double his rent.

Among the Verbs we see, to rear cattle, run riot, p. 101. The would is used instead of our must or should; drones wolde be killed, p. 76, plough-gear wolde be made of dry wood, p. 12; this reminds us of the Northern will I light the fire? The Old English idiom, answering to the Latin supine (dictu turpe) is continued with new Adjectives; calves are able (fit) to kyll, p. 61. But this is changed in p. 22, where sciendum est appears as it is to be knowen; a new Passive idiom soon to be used by Coverdale. The verb sprynge becomes transitive, a tree will sprynge roots, p. 83. The verb beat gets the new meaning of fatigare; horses are sore beate (conquered by weariness), and therefore unable to draw, p. 25. The verb make, as usual, is used without any equivalent to the Latin Accusative se following; there are three men, and a potycarye to make the fourthe, p. 74. The new verb twyrl is formed from the old þwyril, a churn-staff, p. 51; here þ is replaced by t. The old nock (notch) gives birth to the verb nick; these are like top and tip. There is another new verb slawe, whence our nautical slue round; it here means both flectere and cadere. We see a curious omission of the Verb in p. 19; sowing is spoken of, and then comes the question, But howe to sowe?

In p. 65 the at, answering to the old on, for the first time follows an Adjective; women ought to be good at a longe journeye; Mätzner here quotes the Scandinavian gætinn at gefi (cautious in disposition). We Moderns look after our servants; in p. 92 they must be well looked uppon.

There is the Scandinavian verb ted, used of hay.

Among the Romance words are champanyon countrey (champaign), badger, pastern, glauanders, brouse (browze), bustard. It is curious to see how entirely Romance the old terms of English sport were; horses have a syre and damme, not a father or mother, p. 61; there is a disease called the affreyd, when a horse has been overridden, reminding us of the Italian fretta (haste), p. 70. In p. 72 acloyde is a hurt given by a nail to a horse; here the French clou is very plain. Oxen may be laboured, p. 55, our worked. The new phrase to survey land had come in; our author wrote the 'Book of Surveying' in 1523. In p. 77 the housbande stands for agricola; the farmer is something inferior, being only a lease-holder or a tenaunt at wyll, p. 83. He rolls his ground, p. 25, and plashes his hedges, p. 78, our pleach. His heed servaunte is also called a bayly (bailiff), p. 92; this term is further applied to the sheriff's officer, p. 101. If a man has true servants he hath a great treasure, p. 92; this term we still apply to domestics. In p. 47 the verb mend becomes intransitive, I think for the first time. In p. 84 the verb peruse means simply to go through; we now limit its meaning. In p. 42 grosse sale stands for our wholesale. In p. 56 we read of reasonable meate; that is, a moderate quantity of meat; the Scotch used sober in this sense. A French sentence comes in p. 73, where vieu, our view, is written, showing the old French pronunciation of the verb; in the same page stands caveat emptor, applied to horse-dealing.

The author gives us some English hexameters, p. 93; the first that we have with no Latin admixture; they end with—

gere, that thou lose none.”

He tells us how to mend a road, and shows how badly this was done about London, p. 81. When a beast died of murrain, it was a custom to set his head upon a pole by the wayside to give warning of the fact, p. 53. In p. 91 the farmer is advised to have a payre of tables (tablets), and to write down anything that is amiss as he goes his rounds; if he cannot write, let him nycke the defautes upon a stycke.

Lord Berners' translation of Froissart may be looked on as a new landmark in our tongue. Those who filled up the gap between Caxton and the learned nobleman, men like Hawes, Skelton, and Barclay, have few worshippers now but antiquaries. But the Englished Froissart, given to the world in 1523, heads a long roll of noble works, that have followed each other, it may be said, without a break for 360 years. Since 1523 there is not an instance of twenty years passing over England without the appearance of some book which she has taken to her heart and will not willingly let die. No literature in the world has ever been blessed with so continuous a spell of glory. Two of her great men, whose works are inscribed on the aforesaid roll, would, by most foreign critics, be reckoned among the five foremost intellects of the world; a large proportion forsooth to be claimed by one nation. The chief thing to remark in the nobleman's work is the new phrase “they had ben a fyghtyng,” quoted in Dr. Murray's ‘Dictionary,’ p. 3; here the a is not wanted, but the Verbal Noun and Participle are confused as usual. Hence Shakespere's lie a bleeding.

The New Testament was printed in English at Worms, in 1525, by William Tyndale of Gloucestershire. Wickliffe had made his translation from the Vulgate, and his work is sadly marred by Latin idioms most strange to English ears; Tyndale, being a ripe Greek and Hebrew scholar, went right to the fountain-head.¹ His New Testament has become the Standard of our tongue; the first ten verses of the Fourth Gospel are a good sample of his manly Teutonic pith. It is amusing to think how differently one of our penny-a-liners would handle the passage; he would deem that so lofty a subject could be fairly expressed in none but the finest Romance words to be found in Johnson or Gibbon.² Most happily, our authorised version of the Scriptures was built upon the translation which Tyndale had almost completed before his martyrdom. When we read our Bibles we are in truth taken back far beyond the days of Bacon and Andrewes to the time of Wolsey and More.

Tyndale shows his Southern dialect in his love of the ea form (so often seen in the 'Ancren Riwe'); he writes treaspas, procead, fearde, swearde, dealt. He writes yerly (early), yer (ere), and yerbes. He has honde, londe, suster, ayenst, forjeven, axe (rogare), anhungred, athyrst, bryd (avis), holpen, boren (natus), tho (illi), brent, goodman, other (aut), them sylfe, whether (uter). He is fond of the old to (dis), but sometimes uses Mallory's corruption, as all to-revyled, Mark xii. 4. Abimelech's skull, that a stone all to-brake, remains to prove Tyndale's Southern birth; this to-brake (di-fregit) is the one verb of his compounded with to that was spared by the Revisers of 1611. Some old idioms, preserved in the South, are inserted, as "take that thine is," "they that," "them that." Tyndale, I think, must have had Wickliffe's version before him ; see, in particular, Matt. xxi. 15. Our spelling was rapidly taking its present form ; sometimes we have altered but one vowel in a verse of Tyndale's, as Luke x. 16.

Among his old phrases, expunged by later Revisers, are tho (illi), wene (putare), soyle (solve), uneth (vix), gobbet, lyvelod (used of the land sold by Ananias), stone-graver, worm (serpens), utter him (expose him), without naye (denial), spyllt (perditi), it fortunéd that (often repeated), advourtrie, unpossible, his duty (his due), he pyght (pitched), mockyng-stoke, I had lever go, be aknowen of, leful (lawful), arede, withoutforth (extrà), unghostly, jangeling, manquellar, manerly, pill (rob), the rysinge agayne, to desease him, to appose, an heepe of teachers, goostly mynded, wedlock breaker, workfelow, pluck him (the eye) out, draw him (the sword) out, raught (reached), fammissment, huswyfly, harberous (hospitable), the same silfe thynges, angle (hamus), seat (throne), a right Israelite, a grece (stairs), norsfelow (applied to Manaen in Acts xiii.), handfast (betroth), herbroulesse (without harbour), longe agon, took (offered) him a peny, in daunger to (liable to), brain-pan, hored (foedus), break up a house (of a thief), ye can skylle of it, make nothyng ado, have in pryce (honour), endevere (force) ourselves to, boldlyer, unthryftes, take shipping, whyther-sumever, come awaye (along), ungoodly (male), brybery (rapina), eny other where, thus farre forthe, lawing, incommer, flawe (flatus), I have sytten, take a (at) worth.

As to the Vowels, the verb plait becomes plat; thus a often replaces e, as star, barn, paril, warpe, popular (poplar, for Wickliffe's popeler); it replaces an old æ, as ate, drave, spate (conspuit). Sometimes the a gets the sound of French ê, for we find prepayre. The e replaces o, for paterne (exemplar) is written for the old patrone (1 Chron. xxix. 18); it is inserted in warely, the old wærlice; it is sounded broadly in loess (loaves); it is clipped in blest (blessed). We see the form broyded (braided) corrupted many years later into broidered; there are forms like appier, biest, and pryer, where the ie or ye still kept the sound of French ê. On the other hand we see bryar (Heb. vi.), a great change, for this may have been pronounced like lyar, as two syllables. The i or y was encroaching on the Southern u, for we have kysse, by (emere), bylde; we find both bym and ben (our been). The o replaces y, as to blyndfold for the blyndefylde of 1440.

Tyndale is fond of the oa for o, as moare. He is fond of u or ou, as in roume, fluddes, bloude, shute (shoot), shuke (shook), astunied, lowse, rowle, bruse, broul (broil); like More and the King, he writes awne (proprius); he has straw for our verb strew, pronouncing it in the same way. He has sow both for seminare and suere. The former rihtwus, rightuous, now becomes righteous, but we still sometimes find here the older rightewes. Tyndale uses his old Gloucestershire form in shues, rueler, drue, slue; the ew encroaches, in the true English fashion, on the French sound ou; for we find teuch and slewithful. The u is clipped; the old piccetu appears as thykette.

As to the Consonants, g is used for gest (hospes), as well as for geste (historia); this latter occurs in Tyndale's tracts. The word wawes (fluctus) is sometimes written waves, a striking instance of a change in pronunciation owing to spelling. The v is struck out, for there is the phrase, "ye worshippe ye wot neare what." The d replaces th in burden and swaddle; we see the curious combination hydther (hither); there is also hytherto. The t is added; we find both graff and graft; the n is often lost, as in afote, astray, they were byd. The r is added, as caterpillar for the old catyrpel; it is inserted in brydgrom, hindermost; and the l appears in coulde (potuit), as it had long before in Scotland. The w is prefixed, as in won, wother, whote (calidus), whoole (totus). Wickliffe's oof becomes wolfe (woof), Lev. xiii. 52. Tyndale is fond of the letter z.

Among the Substantives we see gripinges (diseases), yockfelowe, unbeliever, firstling, forskin, birthright, fatling, fote stole, menstealer, callynge (vocation), thankes gevinge, the utter side (outside), longe clothynge, weakling, whoremonger, ofscouring, cole panne, erthquake, shyre toune, shewe bread, stonegraver, shipwracke, snoffers (of a candle), a castawaye, foreknowledge, warfare, stumbling block. The word reech, in the account of St. Paul's shipwreck, has been since made creek. The Verbal Nouns, coming down from the North, are so prevalent that sainges translates verba; there is "have our beinge." In Heb. xii., speaking against him has been since turned into contradiction. Tyndale changes the old roore (tumultus) into uproure; Coverdale has the same new word. Tyndale has love, which the Revisers of 1611 have unluckily altered into charity. Unlike Shakespere, he applies harlot to none but women, thus altering the old usage. He writes welth for welfare, and commen welth instead of the old common wele; he is always using helth for salvation; work out your own salvation appears as performe your owne health; the subsequent change was an improvement. The forms morowe and mornynge are carefully distinguished in Luke xxiv. 1. Tyndale is fond of the words churl, man of war, loving kindness; he employs Barclay's new term dronkard, and other innovations of that fashionable author. Instead of pass-over, which he employs in his own treatises, Tyndale uses ester lambe (Matt. xxvi. 17), one of the tokens of his abode in Germany. We may credit him with coining the word atonement; this he uses in 2 Cor. v., putting a few verses later that ye be atone (at one) with God; the new noun has been altered into reconciliation. In Exod. xxix. 33 this new word atonement is employed for an expiatory offering, and this is the sense in which we now use the word; it was copied from Tyndale by Coverdale in this particular verse. In Heb. viii. 1 pith (medulla) is used with reference to words; it has since been replaced by sum. In 2 Cor. iv. 8 the words "we are not without shyft" have been altered into not distressed. In the second verse of this Chapter clokes of unhoneſtie has been since turned into "the hidden things of dishonesty." In Col. iii. 15 men are called in one body, a new sense of the noun. In 1 Cor. iv. 17 St. Paul is made to talk of his ways, Queen Margaret's new sense of the word. In the third verse of this chapter, man's daye has since been altered into man's judgment, the former word thus explaining the days man (judex) to be found in Coverdale's version of Job; these were new senses of the word in English. There is blackemore often written for Ethiopian; the e in the former word is still sounded, a rare thing with final e in English. Tyndale's softenes, which is to be known unto all men, has been altered into moderation. We here first find busy body; cursed speakynge, p. 166, has been altered into blasphemy. Tyndale is fond of striking off new nouns, by adding ness to an old word; craft and filth thus give birth to craftiness and filthiness; there is also childeshnes, blessednes, and the Romance synglenes, ferventnes, gloriousnes, puernes (purity), and many such. The ship is employed to form apostleship. The old mannis sone is now thrown aside for the sone of man. There is the idiom for my sake and the gospels (Mark x. 29). We read of John the Baptiser. There is yeres (anni) instead of the old zeer, the Plural that lasted down to 1400; on the other hand, Tyndale talks of five yooke and ten pounde. He writes Mary Jacobi for "Mary the mother of James" (Mark xvi. 1), an unusual addition to the Vulgate. He has ryse from deeth, where, for the last word, we substitute the dead. He has bucking time (Gen. xxxi. 10), which has been altered into a long periphrasis. His phrase young men has somehow been altered into servants.

Among the Adjectives we find like mynded, unholy, goode for nothyng, fatfleshed, inwarde parties, beggarly, stiffenecked, two-edged. There is the expression the cool of the day, where an Adjective stands for a Substantive, we see also with her young. The word up ryghte is disjoined, and is used in a physical rather than a moral sense (Lev. xxvi. 13). The hye mynded is used in a bad sense; we later English have raised it to the level of magnanimus; this goes against our usual practice of debasing words; Tyndale is fond of compounding with this mynded. He also adds less, as botomlesse. The word manifold, expressing ingens, is coupled with a Singular Noun (Eph. iii. 10). The lively is often used in the graver sense of the word. The word fearful is used in one sense (Heb. x. 27), in another sense four verses farther on. The ysh is added, as in blackish, reddish. St. Paul says his speech is whomly, our homely; this has been altered into contemptible. Orrmin's oferrhand now becomes the upper hand; Coverdale uses both these forms, and has also superiority. Tyndale has the curious idiom, "loaves were lawful to eat" (Matt. xii. 4). He writes "Hosanna in the hiest," where Wickliffe had added the word things to the Adjective. An idiom of Layamon's is continued in Deut. iv. 40, where something is given thee thy life longe

(for thy life); hence comes livelong. Tyndale is fond of foul for immundus, and of is comly for deceit. The word rash changes its meaning from acer to temerarius; do nothing rasshly. The word sad (gravis) was now used for tristis in the South, though Tyndale has the old sense of the word in his treatises. In 1 Cor. ii. 13 cunning is applied to the words of the Holy Ghost. The old as good as crops up once more; the aged Abraham is called "as good as dead."

Among the Pronouns we see the two forms that have come down from the North, it is I, and it shall be oures. The old in her middis of 1400 is replaced by in the myddes of you (Acts ii. 22). The former ic hit eom is changed into I am he; and Wickliffe's tho it ben that appears as they are they whych. The Latin pronoun hic is turned by Tyndale into he here (this here man), John xxi. 21. There is a very Latin idiom of Tyndale's in 1 Cor. viii. 5, "there be that are called goddes." The that is used in the new sense; the question is asked, "are ye able to drink?" the answer is made, that we are. The old mysilf is altered into myne awne silfe. The one following an Adjective is now made Plural; we see lytle wonnes. The another may follow one, but not each; one another's members (Rom. xii.); there is also the phrase see ether other; the ether is elsewhere used for uterque. The old twyfealdlicor is changed into two folde more (Matt. xxiii. 15). Tyndale is fond of prefixing a to Numerals, as they were about a five thousand, an eight dayes. He has from whence, where the first word is not wanted. The where, coupled with a Preposition, is much used as a Relative, as whereunto, whereof, etc.; an idiom dating from 1160. Tyndale is fond of the Relative idiom, a man which; which he called them he justified; and the first clause in the Paternoster. The whose wyfe of them shall she be is curious, coming down from Wickliffe; there is also whose shewes of his fete I . . . lose (Acts xiii.), whom do men saye that I am? Tyndale has a peculiar way of translating qualis spiritus, using what maner sprete. The new as many as replaces Wickliffe's hou manye evere. We see such like, where the like really comes twice over, as in the Gothic swaleikata galeik. The much is sometimes replaced by Trevisa's a greate deale; still we see moche goodes. There is a curious token of the popularity of the old English ballads; in them the line often occurs by Him that died on tree; in the first chapters of the Acts Tyndale twice uses the phrase hanged on tree, dropping the Definite Article.

Among the new Verbs we see eye, wede out, undergird. There is cutt (secavit) instead of Wickliffe's kitted. There is both lewgh and lawght (risit). There is the intransitive hanged, which is dropped in our time. Tyndale well renders an expression that had been bungled by all former translators, what have we to do with thee? He sometimes uses are (sunt) instead of the be of former times; still he has be ye come out? The can is encroaching on the old may (possum). The schul not mowe of Tyndale's youth is now altered into shall nott be able. In Heb. xii. 20, Tyndale's must have bene stoned seems preferable to the shall be stoned of the Revisers. Our author often substitutes will for Wickliffe's shall; in one verse we have yf we shall saye from heven, he wyll saye, etc. There is the old form they had (would have) repented; on the other hand, the old wære (esset) sometimes becomes shulde be. The do and did are often prefixed to verbs, especially on solemn occasions. We see the Past Participle Nominative eny man beyng circumcised, etc. (1 Cor. vii.); this had formerly been confined to the Ablative Absolute. This Past Participle is used without any noun preceding; abstain from strangled; some instances of this were altered by the Revisers. In Acts xxi. the dores were shut to; a form of 1180; a gate is shett uppe in the parable of the Ten Virgins; we shut up a house. Tyndale is fond of adding up to verbs, as stay thee up. He leaves a thing undone (infectum), where former writers did not employ the last word (Matt. xxiii. 23); so, in let me go the last word is a novelty; it is the same with hear tell. We have seen they are come; we now have they are crept in (Jude). The new phrase they were pined awaye appears instead of the old forpine; this for was being dropped in the South; there is also the intransitive pine away. The former emboldish makes way for bolden; Tyndale's knew before is not so neat as the Revisers' did foreknow. We see howe longe is it agoo replacing the old hou moche of tyme is it. He employs the weighty rend (scindo) where former authors employed slit and kit (cut). He produces a fine effect by altering the construction of a sentence, as hated shall ye be, silver have I none. The phrase get thee hence comes often; but they got themselves to Pilate (Matt. xxvii. 62) is unusual. The old delve is supplanted by dig. There are the phrases cast in his tethe, the day wears away, put on raiment (not do on), make a shewe of them (like Barbour). Tyndale is fond of the verbs wag, kill, wax, hale. The verb hurt changes its sense, being applied to the mind, like offend (Mark xiv. 29). There are both lay a wayte, and lie in wayte. We see the new phrases fynde fawte with, puff up, break to shevers, bid him God spede, bring us on our way, make light of it, make spede to, set at ease, there goeth a sayinge, welc stricken in age, marke (ecce) (Luke i. 36), go a warfare, he blesses himself, do folly, brede doutes, set himself to seek, take a courage, cares ythe, call to remembrance (mind), have in honour, shew him a pleasure, have knowledge of, go beyond his brother (get the better of). In 1 Cor. iv. 6 we have preferred Coverdale's to be puffed up to Tyndale's intransitive swell; this last, implying importance, seems to be the parent of a modern slang noun. In Luke vi. 33 Tyndale is inferior to all translators, both before and after him, "yf ye do for them which do for you." He adopts the new idiom, putting the needless a into she laye a dyinge, as if the last word was a Verbal Noun; and there are other instances of this fault. We see an unusual idiom in Mark xi. 14, never man cate frute of thee (the fig-tree); we hardly ever employ this Imperative, standing singly, except in a blessing or a curse, though in 'Quentin Durward' stands "some one give him another weapon." We see the old Subjunctive in till thou have payed. There are new compounds with Participles, such as moth-eaten; overflowen is written for the rightful overflowed. Peter, at the Transfiguration, says, here is good beinge for us.

As to Adverbs, we see again supplanting the old eft and eftsoone; there is the pleonasm turn back again. The old feorran or afer, as in Fisher, has of added, as afarre off; there is also a good waye off. Where we should use if only, Tyndale places and hit wer but (Mark vi. 56). In not that eny man hath sene (an advance upon Caxton's phrase) the second word expresses quia; it is curious that the Gothic here should be ni patei. The word shortly is often used for max. We saw often tymes in 1303; we now find thyne often diseases. Tyndale uses to the utmost, thus wise, derely, coupled with beloved. In 2 Cor. vii. 9 he uses godly first as an adverb (now altered), then as an adjective; he has also the awkward hollyly. The but appears in a curious new phrase, following a negative (Judges xiv. 3), "is there not a woman . . . but that thou must go," etc.; this differs from Wickliffe, and Coverdale strikes out that. The yea had stood in the middle of a sentence; Tyndale places it at the beginning, as ye and they bynde hevy burthens. A sentence begins with not so, in token of denial. The neither sometimes comes twice over, as in Matt. xii. 32, where Wickliffe had nether . . . ne (nor). The on is much used as an Adverb, especially in have on a wedding garment. The Greek oun is translated by now; we see this foreshadowed by the Gothic nu in Luke xx. 33. Orrmin's all reddy comes very often. The old over in composition is quite supplanted by the upper of 1300, as the upper captayne. There are the Adverbs mightily, altogedder borne in synne, but rather, fall flat, far spent, once for all, by all means, and Fisher's afressh.

Among the Prepositions we remark the new oute a dores, which comes often; in Matt. v. 13 we see that this a represents an at, not an of; oute at the dores. The is at her liberty replaces is free. This at is still used in its old friendly sense; come at hym (Luke viii. 19). There is the old-fashioned have to her husbände an infidell. The Northern unto is much employed for ad. There is the phrase join hard to. There is the pleonasm a good waye off from them (Matt. viii. 30). This of appears both as an adverb and a preposition in shake of the duste of youre fete. Tyndale has the new idiom, sick of a fever; he substitutes the of for the old for in rejoyse of that shepe (Matt. xviii. 13); so, zeal of thine house. We see a new idiom in of weak were made strong. Wickliffe's avenge me of myne adversary and rebuke the world off synne are both preserved. Tyndale delights in complain on (of) a man. He likes upon (about) a thousand; we should prefix close. The because of is used for ob. He is fond of a as a contraction for on, as in fall a lusting and lyers awayte (in wait). He has very weak translations in go after me, Satan; weep on it (Luke xix. 41), rich in (towards) God (Luke xii. 21); these he must have borrowed from Wickliffe. He has bow in (at) the name of Jesus, withstode him in the face. The by is sometimes dropped, they retourned another way. The old on the way is altered into by the way (Mark viii. 27); this by has added to its old sense de, Barclay's new meaning contra, which was to be in common use for a century, "I know nought by my silfe" (1 Cor. iv. 4). The with all is used to express the instrument, often standing at the end of a sentence (Matt. xvi. 26). The with keeps its old sense of versus, as have pacience with me. The Pharisee in the parable prays with hym silfe. The beyond had hitherto been connected with space; we now have beyonde their power (2 Cor. viii. 3). The old sense of extra in beside comes out in put her besyde her purpos (Mark vi. 26). The old ongen (Wickliffe's azens) used to stand for opposite to, but Tyndale prefixes over, as over ayenst the temple. He wrote strayne out a gnat; the out has since been changed into at.

As to Interjections, Wickliffe's lo is sometimes altered into behold; the God forbid! of the old Wickliffe version is preserved. The what! could ye not watch? is something new; the first word was once swa or so. There is the tush! brought from the North.

Among the Romance words we see the old passing (valdè) exchanged for exceedynge, as exceedynge wroth. The word avoyd is applied to Satan by Christ in Matt. iv. 10. The phrase no doute is often inserted in a sentence. The old riches is used as a Singular Noun in Rev. xviii. 17. We see unpossible, uncredible; but, on the other hand, inexcusable. The French and Latin seem to struggle together in sever and separate, dissemble and dissimulacion, perfait and perfect; we see auctorite, sanctes, suttelte; in 2 Cor. viii. we have both equalnes and equalite. Tyndale uses except for nisi; the "unless ye have believed in vain" has been foisted in by later Revisers. They have also changed his verite into truth. On the other hand, he uses grudge for the Latin queri, though he sometimes has murmur. We hear of the priest's duty (due). Tyndale unluckily changed aferde into the French afrayed, and substituted natural for the old kindly. He has wait for it, presydent (judex), in the audience (hearing) of the people, continually, distribute, have compassion on, to question with, to passe over (omittere), enter in, disposed to, count the cost, thy bill, in respect of, charitably (lovingly), parlour, discourage, remit, peaceably. The verb departe is sometimes used for separare. Tyndale's old namely has since been altered into especially. He constantly uses to improve for rebuke; he is very fond of counterfait, once writing be ye counterfeters of God. Christ asks the Pharisees to asoyle Him a question (Matt. xxi. 24). The verb vex is employed as it still is in Scotland for torment. There is a new sense of dress, as applied to vineyards. In wyse in youre awne consaytes we see what has led to the present debased meaning of the substantive. The verb geste is used for jocari; we have already seen the noun geste (jocus) in 1303. He is fond of because, translating ut by be cause that (John v. 23). He decided that trouble, not travail, was to English turbare; travail was set apart for another use. He has troubbelous, loynes, of necessitie (not nedes), I certifie you, men of activity, trounce (vexare). Cain is called a renegate (now made vagabond); here the form of a French word suggested an analogy with the Teutonic run and gate (via); we now talk of runaways. The word damage (damnum) appears in its French dress. There is a new noun from fry; Tamar is said to cook frytters for Amnon; Wickliffe here used soupynges. Instead of the old noyous the York noysome is used. The old leopard here appears (also in Coverdale) as catt of the mountayne (Rev. xiii.); hence the American catamount. Wickliffe's sue (go after) is turned into ensue; peace is to be ensued. Our vile is used in its Latin sense (humilis) when applied to our bodies ; the word has been since degraded. The verb regarde means æstimare ; this meaning is, in our day, retained in the noun alone. The noun quarrell bears its true sense of querela in Col. iii. 13 ; we now make a difference between querulous and quarrelsome ; in Scotland the phrase quarrel a man (culpate) still prevails. The Romance and Teutonic combine in men-pleaser, mercy-seat, and eye service. We still describe a circle, but we cannot describe (mark out) land, as in the book of Joshua. The word tutor was long used in Scotland for guardian ; the word governor, down to Pope's time, expressed the man entrusted with the care of a youth ; we hear of tutors and governors in Gal. iv. Tyndale wrote of "eating and drinking damnacion ;" this last word, now so terrible, might, in his day, bear the mild sense of a temporal judgment ; it is one of his phrases that the greatest Conservative would like to see altered. Tyndale sometimes writes cherubyns with the needless s at the end. It is said to Moses, "Aaron shall be thy prophet ;" the last word here means forspeaker, "thy champion in speaking." In 2 Chron. xxiv. a colleccion is made for the Tabernacle. In the next Chapter men conspyre against a King ; in Latin a different word was used for this idea.

As to Latin words, Tyndale uses tetrarcha, stellio, lacert, taxus ; a centurion becomes a pety captayne and an under-captayne. There is a love of using the Accusative of classic proper names, as Damascon, Mileton, Troada. We have Candy for Crete, Cicil for Cilicia ; Wickliffe's Sirie, Pounce, and Pasch become Siria, Poncius, and passover ; a town near Rome is called Apiphorum ! Tyndale uses congregation to translate ecclesia, for which he was rebuked by More. Wickliffe's circumcide is turned into circumcise ; the Infinitive yields to the Past Participle form. Tyndale has holocaustes instead of Wickliffe's brend offringis. The word minister is sometimes used for servus. He is fond of enform for docere, the Jews enform Festus against Paul ; hence comes our common informer. His translate (carry away) is a very favourite word with him. There is laude (laus), in conclusion, instantly (strenue), seniours (elders), post (nuntius), chefest (maximus), momentary, terrestrial, unserchable, finally, varaventure, conclude (resolve), entreat (tractare), circumspect, unfeignedly, devilish, void, to joy, allegory, apt to teache. He is fond of the verb faint, and of immediatly; he brought in the compound term judgement seate instead of the old dom-stol. The well-known full of grace is applied to the Virgin by Tyndale; this was afterwards altered into highly favoured. The Northern sense of cattle (pecus) is at last established in the South by Tyndale. The thieves on the cross are said to check (twit) Christ (Mark xv. 32). There is the old form parte taker, used for participator, besides the other form partaker; in Gal. v. *parte takynge*s has been later replaced by heresies. The old verb jeoperd appears, which we have now made jeopardise. The ness is often added to Romance roots, as gentleness, cherfulness, unquietnes, humblenes, variablenes. There is both hability and ableness. The old Adjectival ish is still applied to proper names, as Babylonish. Tyndale's singleness has been often altered into simplicity, and his similitude has become figure.

There is a word akin to the Dutch; stripe (plaga). We read of the staves of a poem, this comes from the Scandinavian verb stava; a stave is one of the component parts of a cask, put in separately. The verb gush also comes from Scandinavia; in our day we apply it to mawkish sentimentalists, and it is therefore, of course, always coming before the public.

Tyndale, though hunted out of his own land, was always a sound and wise patriot; his political tracts are as well worth studying as his religious books. He uplifted his voice against the folly of England's meddling in foreign wars, at the time when Zwingli was giving the like wholesome rede to the Switzers. Tyndale's works fill two goodly volumes, yet these contain only about twelve Teutonic words that have become obsolete since his time; a strong proof of the influence his translation of the Bible has had upon England in keeping her steady to her old speech. As to the proportion of Latin words in his writings, of his nouns, verbs, and adverbs, three out of four are Teutonic, and in this pure style he is rivalled by his great enemy, the Chancellor.¹ Never were two English writers better matched in fight than More and Tyndale; loud was the wrangling over the Reformer's rendering of the Greek Scriptural words charis, ecclesia, presbyteros, latria, metanoia. All Greek scholars must see what an advantage Tyndale had over Wickliffe, when we read an absurd version of Wickliffe's in the parable of the son, who at first refused to work in his father's vineyard, but afterwards "stirid by penaunce" went.² The men that loved not the Reformation had a rooted mistrust of Tyndale's Bible. Long after the Martyr's death Bishop Gardiner, in 1542, brought forward a list of 102 Latin words (so he called them), which ought to be retained in any English version "for the majesty of the matter in them contained." Among these majestic words were olacausta (sic), simulacrum, panis, peccator, zizania, hostia, and others of the like kind.³ It was a happy thing that the Bishop was forbidden to meddle in the business; and this Protestants and philologers alike must thankfully acknowledge. But the old housel, which, in the English mind, was linked with the Roman idea of the Eucharist, was cast aside when the Reformation triumphed. Tyndale kept his eye upon each succeeding edition of Erasmus' Greek Testament, and thus made his own English version more perfect. I now quote a passage from his 'Obedience of a Christian Man,' put forth in 1527; this will show the scholarship of

“ Ille Dei vates sacer, Esdras ille Britannus, Fida manus sacri fidaque mens codicis.”¹

“ Saint Jerom translated the Bible into his mother tongue: why may not we also? They will say it cannot be translated into our tongue, it is so rude. It is not so rude as they are false liars. For the Greek tongue agreeth more with the English than with the Latin. And the properties of the Hebrew tongue agreeth² a thousand times more with the English than with the Latin. The manner of speaking is both one; so that in a thousand places thou needest not but to translate it into the English, word for word; when thou must seek a compass in the Latin, and yet shall have much work to translate it well-favouredly, so that it have the same grace and sweetness, sense and pure understanding with it in the Latin, and as it hath in the Hebrew. A thousand parts better may it be translated into the English than into the Latin.”

Tyndale's treatises have a few old forms that have been dropped since his day, such as parishens, crome (crammed), crope (crept), clamb, lopen. Like Trevisa, the priest of Berkeley near the Severn, Tyndale has the unusual forms cobweb and inner (interior). Many of his phrases come from the 'Gesta Romanorum,' the great manual of preachers. He has the proverb claw me, claw thee, ii. 206; bald as a coot, ii. 224. One of his most interesting pages is i. 304. After quoting look ere thou leap, he gives a string of proverbs bearing hard on the clergy; the whole shows how Lollardy had been at work for scores of years in England, even down to 1520. Tyndale thus delivers himself.

When a thing speedeth not well, we borrow speech, and say, “the bishop hath blessed it;” because that nothing speedeth well that they meddle withal. If the porridge be burnt too, or the meat over-roasted, we say, “the bishop hath put his foot in the pot,” or “the bishop hath played the cook;” because the bishops burn whom they lust, and whosoever displeaseth them. “He is a pontifical fellow,” that is, proud and stately. “He is popish,” that is, superstitious and faithless. “It is a pastime for a prelate.”

² Here we have the old Southern form of the Plural of the Verb; it is not often found after Tyndale's day.

“It is a pleasure for a pope.” “He would be free, and yet will not have his head shaven.” “He would that no man should smite him, and yet hath not the Pope’s mark.” And of him that is betrayed, and wotteth not how, we say, “he hath been at shrift.” “She is master parson’s sister’s daughter;” “He is the bishop’s sister’s son;” “He hath a cardinal to his uncle;” “She is a spiritual whore;” “It is the gentlewoman of the parsonage.” “He gave me a Kyrie eleyson” (nothing but fair words). And of her that answereth her husband six words for one, we say, “She is a sister of the Charterhouse;” as who should say, “She thinketh that she is not bound to keep silence; their silence shall be a satisfaction for her.” And of him that will not be saved by Christ’s merits, but by the works of his own imagination, we say, “It is a holy-work-man.” Thus borrow we, and feign new speech in every tongue.

After reading such a page, we understand how the English agent abroad came to address thus Cromwell: “You wrot that (Tyndale’s) answer was unclerkly done, and so seme all his works to eloquent men, because he usethe to write a symple stile, nothing sekyng any vaine praise and commendation” (‘Ellis’ Letters,’ series iii., vol. ii. p. 207). No wonder that Tyndale’s Bible has rooted himself in England’s heart.

A churl used to be called ironically Thomas Curteis (courteous), ii. 182; hence we see how the last syllable of the surname, pretty common now, ought to be spelt, in the good old French way. In i. 299 stands “we know not whether they be good or bad, or whether they be fish or flesh;” to this Heywood was soon to add something. In i. 321 comes a reference to Robin Goodfellow’s nightly achievements in a household; Tyndale is fond of alluding to the popularity of the Robin Hood ballads. Priests used to say, “Do as we bid you, and not as we do,” ii. 127; this has since been heard in the mouths of certain Protestant clerks. In ii. 320 the *mumpsimus*es of divinity are mentioned; the joke referred to is well known. We can put our finger, I think, upon the very last juggling ceremony invented by Roman priestcraft before the great Overthrow in England; the morbus Gallicus, a new arrival, is plainly referred to in the following hit at the clergy, "if God punish the world with an evil pock, they immediately paint a block and call it Job, to heal the disease instead of warning the people to mend their living," ii. 105 (Last Part). If this bears on the New, the passage now to be cited bears on the Old; Wolsey is assailed for turning against Charles V., and defying "the majesty of so mighty an Emperor, whose authority both Christ and all His Apostles obeyed," ii. 322; Tyndale, as we see, was one of the last outsiders who showed any reverence for the Holy Roman Empire. In his travels he had remarked the Wends, "inclosed in the midst of the land, of a strange tongue which no Dutchmen (Germans) understand;" these uncouth tribes he connects with the Vandals, and thinks that they quartered themselves upon the Germans in Carolingian days, ii. 268. But he is not so apt to trip, as a general rule, in his history, much of which he took from Platina; Englishmen hitherto had known very little beyond their own chronicles; but Tyndale, compiling from this Italian writer, now gave them some notion of Papal history. He is guilty, I fear, of the sin of taking the Great Karl for a Frenchman. He is fond of a pun, either Latin or English. He turns the tropological sense of the Schoolmen into chopological; works of supererogation become with him superarrogantia; he says in ii. 37, "that every man is a person (parson, priest) for himself, to defend Christ's doctrine in his own person." He talks of the Pope as "their unchaste (I would say their own chaste) father," ii. 123; here we see how both u and ow were still sounded like the French ou. De Lyra is brought up against him; he answers that De Lyra delirat. More had spoken of the Church ceremonies as "holy strange (out of the common) gestures;" Tyndale answers, "for the holiness I will not swear, but the strangeness I dare well avow," ii. 85 (Last Part); this forestalls Fox's well-known remark about "a pious fraud."

As to Vowels, the a supplants e in the title of Sir Harry Gilford, i. 395; this Harry is to this day continued in a few families, as the Vanes. When Tyndale has to write the German Hans he calls it Haunce, i. 406, just as Maudlin stood for the French Madeleine. The old ie still expressed the French ê, as in the Passive Participle lien. He uses both history and story for historia; the latter form dates from 1280.

As to Consonants, his West country v, replacing f, appears in visenomy (facies). In i. 311 we see in one sentence, gest (factum), and jest (ludere); elsewhere gest is used for historia, as i. 80. The German town of Marburg, where Tyndale had some of his works printed, is sometimes Anglicised into Marlborough, i. 129. The t is added to the old were (eras), as thou wert, i. 501. The l is struck out, Manning's melkslope becomes milksop. The n is struck out, Leominster appears as Lemster. The great fighting Pope of Tyndale's time has his name Anglicised, as July.

Among the new Substantives are knavery, belly-love, the weigh house; there are some of Skelton's new words, as bungle, cock of hay, etc. Tyndale is fond of Verbal nouns, as a dazing, mumming, bishoping (confirmation), his trying (trial), their justifying (justification). The old swima (vertigo) appears as swimming. The word living is used both for maintenance and way of life, ii. 6, 41. The ness is often tacked on to Teutonic words; there is saltness, evilness, and Fisher's towardness. Tyndale often uses the suffix head instead of hood, as widowhead. There is the curious word miss woman (meretrix), i. 70; in p. 334 this becomes a mis-liver; in the next Century Pepys talked of the Earl of Oxford's miss; since the time of Congreve and his Miss Prue we have applied the noun to virtuous young ladies. In i. 201 we find landlord (squire) opposed to tenant; the former is exhorted not to "take in commons." His wife is called landlady, ii. 59. The auricular confession appears as ear shrift. In i. 276 we see Tyndale's greatest mistake in philology; he had heard his countrymen in the West talk of a priest as a volower or fulwer, the Old English word for baptizer; he gives the curious reason, "because the priest saith Volo, say ye." He had coined the word atonement for his translation of the Bible; in i.

287 he speaks of an intercessor as an at-one-maker ; in ii. 154 atonement stands not only for reconciliation but for expiation ; for making-at-one is there used as a synonym for satisfaction, and it bears this last sense in Coverdale's Version. In i. 310 cross is used for affliction. He loves shew as a synonym for appearance and spectacle. He explains shewbread, i. 419, "because it was always in the sight of the Lord." In ii. 219 we read "what a stroke hath Satan among us!" in the previous sentence stands "the devil hath a great swing among us;" in i. 530 "the sect (of heretics) goeth now in her full swing." This last word seems here to bear the sense of vibrare, not ferire. Another word for ictus appears in ii. 8 ; "at the first chop." The wits stand in Tyndale for the intellect, for the senses, and also for whims ; see ii. 93. The word lust is so far from expressing libido alone, that in ii. 168 we read that "it is a lust (pleasure) to behold God's countenance." Tyndale has also the old substantive unlust, soon to vanish. Manning had used toy for dalliance in 1303 ; Tyndale uses the word much like children's play, ii. 11 (Last Part).¹ The word thing was in high honour ; the Virgin had often been called "that sweet thing," and Tyndale speaks of Christ as a thing soft and gentle, ii. 120 (Last Part). We cannot now apply this substantive to a person, unless in a patronising way. In ii. 177 (Last Part) welcome is turned into a Substantive. He has the phrase lambs of true believers, ii. 10, "like a jewel of a man;" Roy has the same idiom. In ii. 265 we read of a dotehead ; Harvey's jolthead most likely came from this, just as diurno became giorno. All through this Century new words formed like the spilbred of 1280 (not bread-spiller) were coming in ; Tyndale talks of a pick-quarrel. The word fellow is a favourite one with Tyndale ; he has fellow member with, i. 202, fellow with Paul, i. 288. The old ferē (socius) was now going out in the South ; Tyndale talks not of a play fere, but of a play-fellow, ii. 302. Speaking of the Maid of Kent, he says, "she was at home in heavenly pleasures;" the Yorkshire phrase for acquainted, ii. 92 (Last Part). In ii. 261 (Last Part) stands we feel it (their trickery) at our finger's end; in the next sentence stands had we but half an eye. There was a male English saint named Witta; he was at this time mistaken for a lady, owing to the last letter of his name, and every one was expected to offer a huge cheese once a year to St. White, ii. 216. We still read of Burgaine (Burgundy).

Among the Adjectives are headstrong, foxy, quick witted, high-climbing, scot free, elderly (coined to replace the old ealdlic), tender eared, beetle-blind. We find small single beer, i. xxiv., Bedlam mad, stark mad, the main sea, thick as hail, ashamed of himself. The word popish begins to be used in our sense, but it has an older meaning, a man was said to be popish, when he was superstitious and faithless, i. 304. The word good expresses libens in "the boy's will was good, to have given a blow," ii. 79 (Last Part), like our "have a good mind to;" Tyndale remarks on the varying meanings of the word. In i. 462 men are blinded a good (omnino), hence our "gone for good." The word homely seems to mean degrading, for it is applied to the last act of Noah's life; in ii. 293 the word bears its old sense, familiar. An allegory may be "a handsome (aptus) thing to beguile with," i. 428. We light upon high learning; in our time a man is deeply read. How an adjective can be degraded in later times we see in ii. 168, where God looketh not sour, but merrily; a hymn of much later date talks of "awful mirth." The word wilful keeps its old sense of sponte in ii. 173. An Emperor who gave in to the Pope is called a soft man, ii. 258. The King of Bohemia, ranged among the three Spiritual and the three Temporal Electors, is called the odd man, ii. 270. The aged hero of the Tenterden steeple story, told by More, is called a silly poor man, ii. 78 (Last Part); here the silly may mean either infelix or stultus. We see Pecoek's unseeable once more. The adverb further is turned into an adjective in i. 203, further authority. We find shamefullest, a form that was not to take root. There is the Comparative more stronger, like Most Highest. There are both earthy and earthish, two wholly new Adjectives, as well as the old erthen. Tyndale is fond of churlish; he has Priapish, and talks of the Romish bishop, ii. 196; here the ish is used in a degrading sense (very different from Orrmin's Romanish), and the honourable ending an is thrown aside. The old selfwilli is here replaced by self-minded, ii. 159 (Last Part), and this was to make way for selfish, many years later.

Among the Pronouns we remark the wits of us (our wits) which comes more than once. The Genitive whose is applied to abstract things; in i. 304 Tyndale talks of a proverb, whose sense is, etc.; he is fond of as who should say. He often talks of the which; Day, who printed his writings forty years later, here strikes out the; see ii. 134.¹ Tyndale sometimes, like his enemy More, uses the old form of 1180, "the tone, the tother." In ii. 4 stands "it is one thing to, etc.; it is another thing to, etc." Instead of not one he has never a one, i. 323; in the Mandeville treatise an would have been written for a. The terseness of old proverbs is seen in no penny, no pardon! ii. 156. We have all in all, and a favourite phrase of Tyndale's, devils and all, ii. 11, instead of "including the devils;" this he got from Chaucer.

Among the Verbs we see the new play bo-peep, make an ensample of, when it cometh unto the point, bid the devil take their souls, catch hold, give room, run at riot, set by the ears, sink or swim, cost him his life, tell tales out of school, bear with him, have the better, pick a purse, set at variance, have word of it, the river is broke in, meet him half way (not mid way), it is of a set malice, go to pot, put him to his proofs, hold hard against him, go (beat) about the bush, swap (hit) him in the face. There are new verbs, such as patch, beggar, buz. Chaucer's Auxiliary Verb have been begins at last to make way, as he had been a roving, ii. 57, instead of he had roved; More writes needed to have been burned, ii. 97 (Last Part). The should is sometimes used as of old, where we put would, should God let his church err? ii. 120; but the would is encroaching, as this fruit would come, that no man should sin, ii. 172 (Last Part). The Northern use of would (for solitus est) appears, he would stir them up with mercy, i. 451. There is a new mode of repetition, with an alternative, in ii. 62 (Last Part); they will say, we may do both. May or not may, I see, etc. The durst (we have in our time all but lost the form) is being replaced by the corrupt dared; he dared say, ii. 207 (Last Part). The Passive Infinitive is coming forward; he received them to be sons, he prophesied it to be overthrown (should be overthrown), ii. 160. In ii. 145 (Last Part) the seeing stands for they that see. The Accusative is suppressed in lend unto men (money), ii. 293. Verbs become intransitive, as vessels that rend, i. 53; they become transitive, as to storm them (vexare procellâ), i. 135. A brewer is said to run out what he has in brewing, ii. 225. The verb oversee in Tyndale has two meanings; oversight bears the meaning of superintendence in p. 408, of neglect in p. 468; overlook in our day bears the same double sense; a man glancing down from above may keep his eyes on an object, or he may heedlessly miss it by looking beyond it to something else. The verb long is used of the desire of a woman with child, i. 246. We saw in the Fifteenth Century that brook (frui) had gained the sense of tolerare; in i. 281 we see the bodily organ that probably conferred this new sense on the Verb, no stomach can brook (this food). Tyndale (a great mistake on his part) insists on putting a very solemn meaning on worship (honour), "by worshipping, whether it be in the Old Testament or New, understand the bowing of a man's self upon the ground," i. 420. But the good old sense of the word is kept in our Marriage Service, "with my body I thee worship;" indeed, Tyndale himself says, ii. 56 (Last Part), that worshipping and honouring are one. The words rob and rove are used as synonyms, ii. 57. In ii. 96 men, on making an agreement, smite hands; hence our "strike a bargain," and "shake hands on it;" in ii. 215, 220, this token is called clapping of hands. We have already seen, stifle a quarrel; in ii. 270 ivy choaks and stifles a tree. In ii. 308 a man "made imagery to bear upon him;" we should now substitute bring for the first verb; the bear gets the new sense of work. In ii. 313 the priests propose to trim Queen Katherine; that is, "settle her affairs;" here we have more of the old than of the new sense of the verb. A verb stands before both an Accusative and a Dative, what fruit they have lost her, ii. 343. The American played out is first found, I think, in ii. 35 (Last Part), "play out his lusts;" there is also hire out to husbandmen. In ii. 46 (Last Part) we see their shot anchor, our "sheet anchor," the implement that is shot out of the vessel; this shows the old connexion between e and o, as preve and prove. We may remember the old to-tusen (di-vellere) of 1280; we light upon it again in ii. 151 (Last Part), he towseth and mowseth Tyndale; hence comes the dog Towzer. More uses the old verb housel, but Tyndale seems to shrink from this, as giving too Roman a doctrine of the Eucharist. He has, well, I will not stick with him, ii. 199 (Last Part); we are not far from stickle. The verb flit is now used of thought. In it stands with the collects, ii. 117 (Last Part), we have the key to our phrase "it stands to reason," with being altered into to. There is came so far forth to say, ii. 38 (Last Part), which we alter into "went so far as to say," like Barbour's sa hey as to, etc. In i. 329 stands hold the heretics unto the wall; the first hint of the place whither the weakest go. The Latin quid juvat is Englished by what helpeth it? i. 226. In ii. 110 a tempest is overblown, a new Passive form; hence our intransitive blow over. The old forceorfan had now quite gone out, and was replaced by cut up, ii. 129; there is seek up, like our hunt up. The will expresses the kindred volo in "if they will so have it," ii. 161. Tyndale is conscious of his purely English idioms; thus he writes that the grandsons of Charlemagne fell together (as we say) by the ears, ii. 266. The verb is dropped in no thanks unto (them), ii. 48 (Last Part); here the noun is made Plural.

Among the Adverbs we remark that the lever (potius), written by Tyndale, was altered by Day the printer into rather about forty years later. The old shrewdly still means malè; see ii. 223, shrewdly paid. We see "a body that is neither—nother" (neutrum), ii. 342 ; Pecoock had a phrase like this. A proper name may be made an Adverb, as Judasly. The wise, added to Nouns, is used to form adverbs, as "a house made tentwise," i. 419, like the Norfolk crosswise. Tyndale has a complex phrase in ii. 34 (Last Part), "our almost no faith at all." An Adverb is turned into an Adjective ; "chastity is a seldom gift," i. 230, something like the often times of 1303 ; this use of seldom is still alive in Yorkshire. A new idiom stands in ii. 192, "how far are they off from good scholars ;" here we should set being before the good ; a further step is made in ii. 138 (Last Part), "so far off from having the laws." We have seen elles where ; we now find one where or another, i. 233. The again is used, as in the St. Katharine Legend of 1220, to strengthen a verb ; "they make poor women howl again," ii. 12 ; here a hint of echo must come in ; Tyndale uses this phrase, perhaps peculiar to the West, more than once. The forth was not yet replaced altogether by on, "he goeth forth and describeth," ii. 34. The flat is used intensively, as "the Sun is flat South," ii. 163 ; Cromwell talked of flat Popery a hundred years later. There are phrases like fore-epistle (former), I see not but that, etc., twice so dear, fair and softly, for ever and a day longer.

Among the Prepositions we remark wish him to hell, within a little (almost), for example.¹ Meat may be over roasted, i. 304, a continuation of overdo. The without is still used for extra, its oldest sense, as "without the host." The in, uncorrupted, still stands before the Verbal Noun, as "he was in taking" (being taken), i. 454. The of is sometimes seen confused with on ; it hangeth of the truth, ii. 50 (Last Part).

Among the Romance words are phrase, puppet, character, (signum), an abject, the passover, jot, effeminate, a preservative, marmalade, comfits, actual, mameluke, pastor, serve his turn, calc (calculate), in good case, one ace less, inveigh against, to sauce, to butter, confusedly, a pill. The porray of the 'Liber Curæ Cocorum' is now confused with pottage, and is written porridge. There is the mixture of Latin and Teutonic in intermingle, fore front, touchstone. The verb train, a form long known, is making way, as trail had done 200 years earlier; we see, train souls to hell, a phrase of More's, i. lii.; the sense of docere was later to prevail over that of trahere. A woman with child longed to eat flesh on a Friday, and was overcome by her passion, i. 246; here the last word partakes both of the old sense pati and the new sense ardere. In i. 337 wait upon is used in its old sense, observe attentively. In ii. 80 "the whole matter of true prayer" is used, where our penny-a-liners would now use raison d'être for matter; this last word was driving out the older force in the phrase no force. In ii. 115 curiosity is used as a synonym for newness; the former word seems almost to gain its present meaning; what is new is curious. So high a sense had attorney in those days that the word is coupled with advocate and mediator, ii. 166. The word sect is applied to the Moslem, in ii. 259. Tyndale uses convey in Skelton's new sense, to be repeated by Shakespeare; also the prevent (forestall) of the Monk of Evesham. The word mart is used for the staple of English goods abroad, which Wolsey wished to transfer from Antwerp to Calais, ii. 319. The word rascal is applied to a common priest, to distinguish him from his superiors, ii. 306. The word appointment is used for promise, ii. 75; and this appointment may be either kept or broken. In ii. 52 (Last Part) piece stands for mulier; in 1290 it had stood for homo. In ii. 76 (Last Part) porter no longer means ostiarius, but stands for portitor. In ii. 121 (Last Part) the verb canvass means examinare, and refers to the past; in p. 159 to the future. In ii. 170 (Last Part) respect means simply glancing at a fact; four pages later we see the old in respect of; there is also in comparison of, i. 435; the three words respect, regard, and consideration have risen in the world, and now imply honour. The word master is used in a new sense in crafts-master (master of their trade), ii. 173 (Last Part). In i. 274 sort stands for homo, much as we say, "he is a bad lot." The word manners is used for conduct, as in the Acts; see i. 303; Wykeham's motto is well known. In i. 115 circumstance stands, where we should now use context. The word merchant may be used for trickster, i. 294; and this lasted for some years; make merchandise of, in the Epistles, implies trickiness. In i. 137 dispense with you stands for grant you a dispensation; the Pope can dispense with a marriage, ii. 323; dispense with, as we now commonly use it, means the Latin auferre. Tyndale laughs at the barbarous Latin of the schools, as quiddity, hæcceity; he spells phantasy in the Greek way, departing from former usage; he uses both the old frailty and the later comer, fragility. A curious phrase, borrowed from the Monk of Evesham, occurs in "his wits are rapt," i. 314. We hear of a new disease, a soaking consumption, i. 341. Tyndale appropriates the words sire and dam to animals, i. 414; in the same page courtesy (humanity) must be shown to beasts; humanity had been earlier used for courtesy; the former is a word that has risen. He has to diet him, it is escaped me, of his own accord, jest him out of countenance. A noun is repeated, strife between person and person (man and man), ii. 26. He is fond of secondarily and partial. We see popery, I think, for the first time, in ii. 85. The verb warrant governs an Infinitive, I warrant him sing mass, ii. 123. He speaks of translating a word in a particular way, for a consideration (a certain reason), i. 227; in our days the term refers to money. We now use the phrase have the grace to very carelessly; in i. 447 More implies that God's grace is here referred to. Tyndale has the substantive pains-taking, perhaps suggested by part-taking. The verb use undergoes a change, he shall use himself unto us, i. 411; we still say, "get used to us." There is according as, where the last word bears its old sense quod, i. 404. The ness is added to Romance words, as mercifulness (differing from mercy), and singleness (simplicity); on the other hand, we see pronity; humbleness is coupled with humility in ii. 273. We come upon play a part, the rôle of our genteeler penny-a-liners; Barbour had written do his part. An idolater is called a serve-image, ii. 62 (Last Part), this style of compound was soon to come very much into vogue.

The words akin to the Dutch and German are snaffle, jerkin (from the Dutch jurk, a frock), aloof. There is the Scandinavian to cham bread, ii. 163 (Last Part); hence came to champ and to jam. More has jabber, from the Icelandic gabba; Tyndale has gibberish, formed from gibber or jabber.

The Yorkshireman, Coverdale, shares with Tyndale in the credit of giving the Bible to England in her own tongue. As to the part due to each translator, the great book called Matthew's Bible was put forth in 1537 by Rogers, Queen Mary's first victim in days to come. For this he used the New Testament and Pentateuch, already printed by Tyndale; the manuscript translations, left by Tyndale, coming down to the end of 2 Chronicles; Rogers then took the remaining books of the Old Testament and the Apocrypha from the Version already printed by Coverdale in 1535. This Matthew's Bible of 1537 became the Bishop's Bible of 1568, and this again was the groundwork of the Authorised Version in 1611.¹ I have gone over the Second Book of Chronicles in Matthew's Version, to detect phrases that are Tyndale's, and not Coverdale's; I there find but and if, have indignacion against, apointment (pactum), tender-hearted, to meke, all that passeth (qui prætereunt). The Book of Ezra is plainly by another hand. Our Prayer Book Version of the Psalms is that portion of Coverdale's work which has been least altered; it is a charming specimen of sound English.

Coverdale has inserted many words and forms that prove his Northern birth. Such are porte (gate), to youl, scalp, wrongeous, wel is thee, wo is me, beseke, galowe, thunderbolt, rygge bone (backbone), moss (palus), stythie, rock (colus), lurk, take root, waged soldiers, forby, the yonside (further side), folkes (homines), what tyme (quum), a ha! fensed, manly, manful, to gloom, ryven downe, axe at me, he leape (loup), seven years are out (over), fore-elder, manswear (perjure), lap in (cingere), the dede doing, olde canckerde carle, make ready gear to flit, fray, by-post, hyrd (pastor), overwinner, skoukinge (skulking) place, have foughten, a mightie sore felde, set a watch, put a stone, to ban (maledicere), have in derision, bandes

¹ I recommend all interested in these matters to read Dr. Eadie on the English Bible; it is all but impossible to catch him tripping.

(vincula), hop (dance). Many of the above appeared in Northern writers before the year 1300. There is the old umbethinke, a very late instance of umbe (amphi). He combines Northern and Southern forms in childer's children, of which he is fond. He uses dyke in its Northern sense murus, not fossa, (Isaiah xxix. 3). He cannot manage his shall and will, writing how wil we escape? now and then; we will (shall) get no quarrel. The Northern sound of a appears in words like twist, fynd. There is the phrase "loke thorow the fyngers upon" (wink at), the phrase so often used in Scotch State Papers about 1570; see Lev. xx. 4. Tyndale uses bug (bugbear); for this Coverdale has bogard, as we see by his compound fray bogard (scarecrow). A man is called a wyne supper; so Edie Ochiltree talks of the kale-suppers of Fife. There is soch one, where the Mandeville treatise had such a one. The distinguishing mark between the two translators is the word namely; Tyndale always uses it in its Old English sense (now obsolete), præcipuè; Coverdale employs it in its Scandinavian sense (now adopted by us), videlicet. He employs Palsgrave's new form upsyde downe. We are able to contrast the Southern and Northern translators:—

Among Coverdale's obsolete words and forms, expunged by later Revisers, I may mention loave (laudare), headlynges, flakre (volitare), coarse (corpus), byll (securis), overthwarte, chaft and chaw (jaw), wywish (fœmineus), what is worth (become) of them, neeres (kidneys), bewepe, woode (insanus), an unlust, sparre (claudere), boysteous, rown (whisper), fyle (polluere), Greke londe, unshamefast, fremde (extraneus), querne, tharmes (ilia), he shope, to fet (fetch), to corage him, were (war), ought (owed) them, waves, everychone, symnels, fitches (vetches), crowd (fiddle), strike a battle, harle (trahere), to unhalowe (profane), wapened man, an (on) hye, wynebery (uva), wel gusted (tasted), barded horses, embassitour, to undisease, he keste (cast). He has the rather rusty I trow, handye worke, the folke, clean gone, after (secundum) our sins, conyes, mollen, wherewithal, rebuke (opprobrium), dayes man, seer, cribbe, nesinge, rybaudes, naughtie (worthless), hosen, fear, (terrere), do almes, woe worth the day, lesyng (lying), embassage, haply, pate, weldoyng, my lovers (amici), reprofe (opprobrium), kynswoman, well liking, the Most Hyest, have evil will at, he taketh me the tymbre (in Petruccio's sense), wash you, lay me down, make inquisicion, pill (spoliare), set by (æstimare), lerne (docere), make mowes at, knap, tell her towers, suck avantage, think scorn, do well unto, lay to thine hand, stick with the sword, the commons (populus). He probably borrowed cat of the mountain from Tyndale's New Testament.

As to Vowels, Coverdale keeps the form ae, as in aegle (eagle); this had scarcely ever occurred after Layamon's time. He sometimes prints saythsayer for soythsayer; this is a good example of the confusion wrought by the double sound of oy, French ou and French ê. The i in the middle is sometimes dropped, as perlous, haply. The u replaces i, as stubborn for stiburn. Coverdale uses the form rightuous, employed by the father of Edward IV.; he has sometimes ynew for enow. We saw the Devonshire spoyll for the old spill (perdere); this is written spoyle early in Psalm lxxiii.; the meaning here is not spoliare.

As to Consonants, the b is inserted in cucumber, coming from cucumeris; it is replaced by p, as prod. The g or h is dropped in the middle, as hyst. We see the proper name Hester now altered into Esther. The d is struck out, for we find hynmost. The old shalm becomes shawm, much as the French col became cou. The word cracking (of thorns) has not yet become crackling, where the l is usefully inserted to mark a difference. The m is inserted, Chaucer's nepereste becomes nethermost, and midleste becomes middelmost. Coverdale has a strange fancy for coupling s and z, writing wyszdom and many such. He has Hampole's frosen, not frozen. Tyndale's noun fassion is altered into fashion. The curious form gardinge appears for garden.

Among Coverdale's new Substantives are shepe hoke, washpot, dore keper, head band, footpath, hammerman, heaven-gaser, bacslwyder, laughinge stocke, shewtoken, creping things, dead burier, mete rodde, water broke, helthe offering (peace offering), forecast, drove, weapon bearer.¹ It will be remarked that many of the foregoing words are compounds. Coverdale is fond of adding ness to an adjective, and thus compounding a new noun by the side of an older one; thus from welth he makes welthyness; in this way he strikes off evell favourednesse, plenteousnesse, fearfulnesse, wytherdnesse, mightynesse, clenlynesse, blood gyltynesse, worthynesse; he even uses hyneness of a tree. There is the phrase "bring thee by shippe fulles," in Deut. xxviii. 68. We see a Northern tendency to prefix prepositions to nouns; thus we find downsitting, uprising, fore elder, indweller, outcrier, out-giving, upstanding, though we still find the awkward nouns the coming in, the going out; he has moreover the noun stil-sitting. He has for my brethren and companyons sakes, dropping the Genitive sign in the first noun. He is fond of body for homo, which is still in Scotch use. He has fatherland, a word that cropped up in England every now and then, and was speedily dropped. The substantive shyne (splendor) reappears after long disuse; the later form was to be sheen. He has baye tre, where the tre added is the continuation of a favourite Old English construction. There is the thoroughly Northern stouk (shock of corn) in Judges xv. 5. He uses whistles for what was afterwards changed into water pipes in the Prayer Book version of the Psalms; he also becomes a wonder, not a monster, unto many. The Plural heathen is in use. Coverdale in the Psalms couples bugges by night with the arrow that flyeth by day; the first-mentioned noun does not mean insects, but hobgoblins. He is fond of kinredes (generations), at deathes dore, at his wits end, worship (honour), your bely full, brech (girdle); he writes no end of treasure (Nahum ii. 9). He loves Verbal Nouns, like clothing; Agur asks for a necessary living; in Baruch ii. justification appears as rightuousmakynge. The word fote, not fotfolk, stands for infantry. We see Chaucer's romble now applied to wheels. In Eccl. vi. plague no longer refers to a disease, but to an evil; this last word has in part replaced it. The word girl, which twice only appears in our Bible, was substituted long afterwards for Coverdale's damsel. One of our common phrases seems to have been suggested by a question in Eccl. xiii., "how agree the ketell and the pott together?" In Eccl. ix. 7 we have, "a quyck dogg is better then a deed lion."

Among the new Adjectives we see bloudthursty, gray headed, wrothful, darkish, heathenish, mouldy, weak braned. The ending ous had already appeared, fastened on to Teutonic roots, as rightuous (rihtwis) ; Coverdale further has the new wonderous and murthurous. He uses true of heart, a stoned horse, weak as water. The adjective is sometimes made a substantive, as the worthies (mighty) in David's lament for Saul ; fat also is in the like case. The substantive is sometimes dropped after the Adjective, as from everlasting. Coverdale's wilful at last expresses the meaning we attach to the word, but stout stands for superbus ; doughty appears as the epithet fittest for warriors, as long before in certain Northern writers. In Nahum ii. 3 stands he maketh him forwarde ; we here seem to see the old Adverb become an Adjective, as before in Scotland. In Ezekiel xxvii. we read of iron redy made, a new phrase. Coverdale writes both of a fleshly felowe and of a fleszshy herte ; the two forms of the Adjective are curious, and both had appeared before.

As to Pronouns, we remark I was he that, etc., other soch (such). In Lev. xxv. 5 stands what groweth of it self ; these last two words paved the way for the new Genitive it, supplanting the rightful his before 1600 ; this soon led to Ben Jonson's its. Many object to it is me, but in Proverbs viii. 4 Coverdale wrote, it is you whom I call. In Ecclus. xiii. a man has supte thee cleane up ; here thee stands for thy goods. The it is used in the old Indefinite way ; the Macca-bees, when fighting, byde styfly at it (2 Mac. xv.) We remember I am one the fairest of 1303 ; this construction is now altered, for we see in IV. Esdras, chap. v., the one only people ; here only is used as a Superlative, much as we say, "the one perfect song ;" the one when coupled with only seems a pleonasm. In the Psalms Coverdale wrote, one depe calleth another ; this has been much improved by the later Revisers, who put deep calleth unto deep ; here is the true English terseness. In Isaiah xi. yongones is written one word, much as we use young 'uns. The none is now coupled with a possessive Pronoun ; a house is none of his (Job xviii. 15). Coverdale is fond of no body and every body.

As to the Verbs, there are phrases like wish him good, to winter, happen on a thing, the work went forward (on), to blast corn, set me a chair, get up (surgere), go mourning, day breaks, lay it waist, make mockes at, kill them down, cast up their noses upon me (Ezekiel viii. 17), fede the fyre, come to light, lie hid, slip in, make clene ryddaunce of, kepe thy word, bid them welcome, get their will of, shake hands. We see "the waters plumped together;" hence our "going plump into a thing." Coverdale has an odd compound of the two forms wære and wast (eras); he writes thou werst (Ezekiel xxviii.) He confuses two different English verbs when he writes me think. In 1 Kings ii. 23 Solomon threatens thus, "Adonias shall have spoken this agaynst his lyfe;" here the verb bears both a past and a future sense. The Infinitive is often set first, as punish will I. In connexion with it a new idiom appears, "he shall never want one, to sit," etc., "the last to fetch him." In Malachi i. 10 stands "what is he that wil do so moch as to shut," etc.; here our terse English speech in later years struck out the first Infinitive, and also the to prefixed to the second. He brings did into questions, as did not I wepe? (Job xxx.) There is a new usage of the Active Participle in 2 Maccabees x., "two dayes were they destroyenge (it);" I suspect that this should be "they spent in destroying." Coverdale is fond of the idiom, "be giving of thanks," "be doing good," "my herte is dyting of a good matter;" in some of these he confuses the Participle with the Verbal Noun, like Chaucer's passing over of Emily. He is fond of setting un before a Past Participle, as untrodden, unloked for. There is the new Participle melted by the side of the old molten; also the Perfect cleved (hæsit), not clave; Tyndale's holpen becomes helped. We see the form drye shod; a Northern phrase. In 1 Sam. vi. 12 we read of the blearing (lowing) of oxen; we now use this verb of trumpets only. We see miss used in two senses: David was missed, and 19 men missed (abfuerunt). There is a new sense connected with spend, "the day is spent." Chariots not only roll, but welter; a man may also welter a stone. There is the phrase to turn (ire) into a house. When Jonah was about to be thrown overboard, the sea wrought (was stormy). In Micah ii. 9 we read, "the women have ye shot out from their houses;" the verb here has since been altered into cast; we now shoot, in this sense, nothing but rubbish. The military phrase fall out is used for sally (Judith xiv.); to fall out in common life suggests a sally of ill-temper. In Ecclus. xxx. we are exhorted to hit (strike) a child, by way of chastisement; hitherto the word had been coupled with a mark. There is the phrase, set to pledge, which reminds us of Catullus ruefully punning on the word opponere. In Nehemiah vii. 5 we see "God gave me in my hert;" the verb has since been altered into put; we still say, "my heart misgave me." For mingere Tyndale used the French word still in our Bibles; Coverdale has a literal translation of facere aquam. In Ezekiel xxiii. 40 set forth thyself means, not proponere, but ornare; it has since been altered into deck; we should now substitute off for the forth. In the Song of the Three Children magnify him has now replaced the earlier set him up, which Coverdale uses all through the poem; our set up (conceited) is well known. We hear of winds overbearing a ship (Ezekiel xxvii.); we have since coined an adjective from this new verb. There is the Imperative wake up, so often in the mouths of our drivers. In Isaiah xviii. 4 we hear of a myslinge shower, a purely Northern word, being a form of mist.

Among the Adverbs we see hard at hand, go straight forward. The old Adverb has lost its rightful e at the end in evell gotten goods. The out is much used as an Adverb, tell it out, live out his days. In treat him roughly the sense of durus is added to that of hirsutus. Coverdale is fond of prefixing prepositions to nouns, as thy out and ingoyng, over pole (upper pool), forecourt. In Ezekiel xxxii. downe, by itself, is employed as a word of command; there is also downe with it! In Joel ii. 22 stands, as in Orrmin, be not ye afrayed nether; an idiom to be continued by Shakespere. Coverdale sometimes uses yes, which was afterwards altered into yea.

Among the Prepositions the upon is used in its old hostile sense, "see his desire upon his enemies." In Solomon's Song, iii. 2, stands "I will go about the city; upon the market," etc.; hence our "go upon Change;" there is also "lend upon usury." In the Psalms is the curious phrase "go on in wikedness;" of old, the on and in had been two forms of one word. The old Icelandic idiom, seen in the 'Cursor Mundi,' reappears, "to seke unto thee;" there is also Roy's new phrase, "lean unto counsels;" "have a zeale unto the lawe." There is the new idiom "when he was at the strongest" (Daniel viii. 8); at the soonest had but just appeared. In 1 Mac. vii. the people "pass over that day;" here the over means per, as we "read over a paper." In Lev. xi. 46 stands "the law over the beestes" (de bestiis); Tyndale here has of. I have seen in late writers the phrase "what is over you?" (what is the matter concerning you?) The over is prefixed to adjectives, as overgreedy.

As to Interjections, Coverdale is fond of the optative O that, etc. In Job xxxi. 30 Oh no! stands at the beginning of a sentence; the first instance, I think, of this now common phrase. There is also no, no! and if no, at the beginning of a fresh sentence. The scornful there! there! of the Psalms is well known. In Proverbs xxx. 15 something "saieth never hoo" (ho!); this last arresting cry, used by Chaucer, has since been altered into "it is enough;" this ho (satis) lasted down to 1630, being used by Mabbe. In Jeremiah li. 14 men cry alarum, alarum! this has been changed into "lift up a shout."

Among his Romance phrases Coverdale has felicity, disdainedly (disdainfully), joly array, wyne bebber (this is not Tyndale's word), temerarious, dyspoynt (disappoint), disfavour, mine encrease, mockage, disquietnesse, salette (armour), party coloured, presterly (sacerdotal), to beutify, my delicates, batel ram, faynedly, unpaciency, innocency, dishonesty (opprobrium), natyves, buckle together (congregedi), adherentes, pledges, (hostages), churchrobber, winegardener (vindemiator), spryn-gald (juvenis). The word presumptuous is used in the old sense of wilful; it has since acquired a new shade of meaning. The old triacle still bears the sense of remedium. The verb discover is used for uncover; this sense still survives on the stage, where actors are discovered (revealed). The verb comfort often means strengthen; comfortable, when applied to the Lord's name, is used in an unusual sense. Coverdale is very fond of employing stomach for cor; as "a high stomach;" what Prometheus did to our stomach is well known to readers of Horace. As to the uses of matter, we see it was a matter of life, whether his matters (negotia) would endure. The old give no force for comes in, but has since been altered into the single word scorn. The villain is used only for a man of low degree. Job wishes to be sued with a lybell; this has been altered into "write a book;" in Scotch law, an indictment is still called a libel. The mys is still used where we now employ dis, as mys-content, mysordre. In Eccl. ix. 16 we read of a symple man's wisdom; Coverdale here uses the adjective in its Northern sense of humilis, pauper; the sentence must have seemed a contradiction in terms to the Revisers of 1611, who therefore changed the adjective into poor. The word bonett is used of the head-gear of both men and women; for the former, tire of thine head has been substituted in Ezekiel xxiv. 17. We have already seen peals connected with bells; we now read of peales of warre, coupled with trumpets; this has been changed into the alarm of war (Jer. iv. 19); we know Shakespere's stage direction, alarums. Coverdale literally translates the Latin aequus, talking of equal (lawful) and right. The word evidence is used in its Northern sense of legal document, and this still remains in Jer. xxxii. We hear of the rascall people (now altered into the poor of the people), Jer. xxxix. In Jer. li. 22 bachelor (now young man) is opposed to maiden; elsewhere honest woman is opposed to meretrix; dishonesty is used for dishonour. In Ezekiel xvi. 30 stands "thou precious whore," just as we talk of a precious rogue; the word has been altered into imperious; Lydgate had this use of the adjective. The word ungracious is often used, as it is still in the North. There is the East Anglian phrase "to labor with child" (parturio); this, coming in the Liturgy, was in our day ludicrously applied by a poor German governess to women of her own craft. In Ecclus. x. we hear that pride is the origenall (principium) of all sin. The word nurtour is sometimes employed for good-breeding, especially as regards the table; Tyndale has not this old sense of the word; well-nourished in Ecclus. xxi. exactly answers to our well-bred. The verb martyr stands for cruciare in 2 Mac. ix.;

the noun in Italian bears this sense. We saw in Tyndale that atonement stood for both agreement and expiation; the latter sense seems to be borne by reconcyle, at the end of 2 Mac. xii. In Coverdale's armlett we see an instance of the Romance let being fastened to a Teutonic root. There is a compounding of Teutonic and Romance in noone day, suerteshippe. Verbs coming from the Latin were not yet quite settled in form; we see the Infinitives corruppe, correcke, suspeck; we insist on using the Past Participle form of these. The former wunder, used as an Adverb, seems to have led to marvelous pale. The ramping found here, borrowed from Chaucer, perhaps was the parent of romping. The verbs consume and convert are sometimes used intransitively. The verb tarry now governs an accusative, "tarry his leisure." Like Fisher, Coverdale is fond of added ed to spirit, thus making an adjective, as meke spreted. The Lord is said to have planted our fathers in; this is the first hint, I think, of plantations, the old word for colonies. A change found in the 'York Mysteries' is repeated; Babylon is called the beutie of the Caldees' honour; here the first noun means decus, not pulchritudo as of old; when we speak of a woman as a beauty, we mean that she is decus sexus. The verb occupy is much used, of trade; Solomon's virtuous woman occupieth wool. In Isaiah i. stands "I hate (it) from my very heart;" this seems to stand for inmost, and is rather unusual. We hear of ravishing (ravening) beasts. In the account of the death of Judas Maccabæus, he is persecuted (pursued). The old form take travail (trouble) is often used. The bones seen by Ezekiel, chap. xxxvii., are called "a marvelous greate sorte" (army); as we now use sort, it answers to genus rather than multitudo; we still keep in the Psalms "ye shall be slain, all the sort of you" (lot of you). The word company is used in a military sense.

The Plural Seraphins is used; there are the proper names Palestina, Philistia; in 1 Mac. xv. we come upon Lucius, the Mayre of Rome. In Isaiah xxvii. 2, Muscatel has since been altered into red wine. In the English text occur the words lamia, tacus. We hear not only of Caldees, but of Caldeish (language); the last-named hoary form was not to survive.

Among the words akin to the Dutch and German are knap (snap). There is the Scandinavian verb scraul, which originally meant rattle; also stale (urina), slavering (saliva), and wherry man.

As to Coverdale's Preface to his Bible, he uses comon welthes for res publicæ, instead of the old comon weales; this had been done by Skelton. He employs wyde from the purpose. It is important, we are told, to tye the Pope shorter; hence came our "cut him short." Scripture setteth every thyng in frame (in good shape); this is something like the later ship shape. The Pope is called a counterfayte Christian; Tyndale had used this adjective in a harmless sense. Coverdale, in these very ticklish times, is careful to speak of England's crown as imperiall. He thus addresses King Henry, "there hath ben of olde antiquite (and is yet unto this daye) a lovyng ceremonye used in your realme of Englonde, that whan your graces subiectes reade your letters, or begynne to talke or comen of your hyghnes, they move theyr bonettes for a signe and token of reverence unto your grace, as to their most soveraigne lorde and heade under God, which thyng no man useth to do to eny bysshoppe." Coverdale tells us that he uses in his Version penance as well as repentance, and declares, misguided man, that there is no greater difference between the two terms than between four pence and a groat.

His friend Grafton uses snu as a Noun.

William Roy was a runaway Franciscan friar, of not the best character, who aided Tyndale in translating the New Testament abroad, and who afterwards arrived at Strasburg in 1526. Two years later he brought out his famous Satire against Cardinal Wolsey, called 'Rede me and be not wrothe' (Arber's Reprint). Roy seems to have been a Northern man by his use of ban (maledicere), lurdain, and kye (vaccæ). The y is put for the French è, as fryre, p. 37; the accent is still thrown on the last syllable of barayne (barren), p. 52. The old noun hwæg here survives as whygg, and the more modern form whey, dating from 1240, stands alongside; whyg and whey, p. 100. Wolsey is called Carnall, a pun on Cardinal, p. 39; this joke thirty years later often did duty against Pole, who was not so open to a satirist as Wolsey was. Like the d in Cardinal, the n is struck out; covent stands for convent, p. 82, whence Covent Garden.

Roy is fond of making new nouns by adding nes, as beneficialnes, unhappines, sluggishnes, lordlynes, noblenes. The title youre ladyshippe was now beginning to come in; it is in p. 85 (as also her noblenes in p. 84); here the flattering friar and the dame, "not very wise," are most happily hit off, quite in Chaucer's style. In p. 93 we read of a lorde of bludde; here high is dropped after of. The noun lorcher is coined from lurk, p. 98; Palsgrave employs it for gourmand; it was then used of a man, in our day of a dog. A bishop is mentioned as a goode Greke in carde playing, p. 117; the abusive phrase has lasted long. Chaucer had talked of a bever hat; this is now cut down to bever, p. 47. We see bed of state (state-bed); when Wolsey destroyed abbeys, he plucked down the costly leades; a new Plural, p. 113. The Annas of the Gospel becomes Anne, for the rime, p. 118; this was the Christian name of the famous French Constable, Roy's contemporary.

As to the Adjectives, we see the origin of make black white in p. 51, where Wolsey can, it is said, make regulars of seculars, makyng as he lyste blacke of whyte (priests). We find whyst (tacitus), p. 65; the adjective in Chaucer's time had been hust.

There is the phrase hear ynough and to moche, p. 90. Mention is made of men being proclaimed heretics, p. 113; the terse answer is, why more we than (he?).

Among the Verbs we see the very old forms, thou myght (potes), p. 37, thou spake (locutus es), p. 104. There is cotha (quoth he), p. 70, lett this pass, make no difficulte, make marchandyse of, hyt the nayle upon the heed, it is to be fearyd lest, etc. There is a well-known Scotch phrase, the upset price; this is in p. 139.

Roy has the new topsy tervy (top side turf way), p. 51. Barclay's change in the sense of by and by is repeated in p. 66.

Among the Prepositions are be in (of) no use, have a wife upon my hande, lean unto tyranny.

As to Interjections, the former devil have the bit that becomes the devil of the whit that (devil a bit), p. 65. Roy's of seems here to stand for have. There is the cry och at the beginning of a sentence, p. 59, and the eager nay, nay, p. 61.

The Scandinavian words here seen are the substantive sloutche and bladder (bag).

Among the Romance words are papistical, gresy, gratis, momchaunce (a game at cards), p. 60, service in plate, p. 93, to improperate (benefices), monkery, reprehensible, turmoil, copy holder, capacity, incomparable, encroach. Roy was one of the first to use popisse, p. 116. The word seniour seems to be employed for dominus in pp. 67 and 83. In p. 43 we find questionist (schoolman), a curious compound of Latin and Greek.

There are the phrases my ladys chamber, foles paradyse. The verb despatch takes the new sense of occidere, p. 146; surmise slides from accusare to putare. Lydgate's perhapis is here revived. The first hint of our bill of exchange is in p. 87; friars entrust their money to other men and spend it by the wryttinge of a bill. The old wonder great is exchanged for marvelous great, p. 145. In p. 112 saints array shrewdly their enemies; trim was now used much like array, both alike meaning ornare. When we see feact in p. 133 there is a struggle between the old French feat and the Latin fact. There is the noun conjecture, which also appears here as a verb, a curious formation.

Roy was one of the last English writers who, addressing the common folk in a ballad, employed shoals of Romance words; Wyatt and Surrey were soon to show us a better way.

John Rastell printed a jest book in 1526, called 'The Hundred Merry Tales' (reprinted by Dr. Oesterley in 1866 as Shakespeare's 'Jest Book'). Here we find a delight in puns and in mimicry of the speech of Provincials. In p. 2 dout is first used in the sense of dubitare, and then in that of extinguere; dout the candell, just as don and doff were now coming into fashion.¹ In p. 55 there is a joke on the two-fold meaning of male; a Welshman when hunting is ordered not to spare a male (he-stag); he forthwith robs a traveller of his male (trunk). The Welsh speech is a standing joke throughout; in p. 150 we have by cottés blut and her (his) nayle, if her (he) be not, etc.; elsewhere it is cottys plut. There is a good story anent the Welsh love of toasted cheese. The Northern dialect is hit off in p. 158; by goodys byens (bones), I is at hart (heart), by goddes sale (soul).

There is the new Substantive maltman. In p. 146 man is opposed to master; instead of saying, "there is no one here," the taverner avers "here is nother mayster nor man." In p. 49 both horse and horsys are used to express the Plural equi; Shakespere also has both these forms. There is a remarkable ellipse in p. 93, "a song worth twenty of it" (the Paternoster); here some such word as copies should follow the Numeral.

As to the Adjectives, we find a mad felow, in the Shakesperian sense; also wete to the skyn. One curious idiom of Superlatives appears in p. 104, "he was not the best clark" (a good clerk).

As to Pronouns, in p. 129 we see the old usage of 1303 continued; the wife addresses the husband with ye; he addresses her with the more familiar thou; they use syr and dame in their speeches to each other, though the husband was but an artificer. In p. 151 stands all sodenly, the forerunner of our all of a sudden.

There is the new Verbal phrase fall at wordys. There is a new sense of cast in p. 83; a man, against whom the verdict is given, is cast, perhaps cast away. There is the proverb, "they stumble at a straw and lepe over a blok," p. 29; this has been since supplanted by the gnat and the camel.

The curious Yorkshire usage of employing but after an oath is revived; by god but I wyll, p. 45; in p. 44 yet is used in the same way, answering to for all that.

As to Prepositions, in p. 37 a man leaps into a ditch

over the head; a very contracted expression, since we have here no mention of water. There is the curious "find hym at Oxford to scole," p. 119. In p. 93 a man "fasts bread and water;" here an on is dropped. The old fall in talking is now clipped; we light upon fall a laughyng, p. 2, and this lasted for more than two Centuries; the last word was doubtless mistaken for a Participle, as we see by Skelton's to fall preaching.

There are the Scandinavian phrases wall eye and dog chepe; dog in Swedish means valdè. There is the Dutch buskin.

Among the Romance words are stage play, permanent, cyrute (of a judge), principal (of a college), intelligence (understanding). We have in p. 17 the first English laugh at the use of fine language; a scholar, fond of eloquent English and curious termis, puzzles a cobbler by talking of subpedytals, not shoes; he also employs semy cercles; Rabelais carried this joke much further. In p. 62 a child answers a hard demand at all adventures (hazards) in the Plural; the forerunner of at all events. We see deute-full (obligatory), p. 140; a new formation. In p. 77 company is used much as we employ society; the good that should precede the noun is dropped. The adverb precisely stands for imperiously in p. 114; so Shakespere, in Hamlet, uses absolute for precise. The old maugre now becomes spyte of, p. 45. In p. 74 Sir is lengthened into Sirra.

In 1527 arrived the first English letter ever sent hither from America, so far as we know; it may be found in Eden's Book on America, p. xiv. (Arber's Reprint); it was written by Rut, the master of the English ship, from Newfoundland. He uses harbor in a new sense (portus), and talks of foul weather; sailors run in their course at sea. Mention is made of Portugal barkes (naves); the new sea phrase is used, "to come into 53 degrees." In another letter of this time, quoted in p. xvi., we read of cardes, that is, charts of the voyage.

In the 'Supplication for the Beggars' (Arber's Reprint), which Fish brought out in 1529, we remark the new word whirlpool, also bloudsupper, a favourite word of Coverdale's.

The Turk gets grounde of Christendom, p. 5 ; we should now say, "gain ground on." The Romance words are profligate, out of joynt, to people. In p. 8 we read of priests' sovereigne ladies ; this explains Skelton's mistress, used for amica. In p. 4 comes the verb assite ; this was a few years later to be cut down to cite. We now transfer as well as translate, a most useful distinction ; but in 1529 the latter of these Latin forms seems to have done double duty ; see p. 6.

Some pieces in Hazlitt's 'Collection' (vols. iii. and iv.) seem to belong to 1530 ; the old bydene appears for the last time, I think, in iii. 178 ; the old awþer (aut) still appears as other, iv. 112. The bi is clipped, for bitwen becomes twen, p. 173 ; the d is added, a man was bounde toward the altar ; this is the old boun (paratus), p. 172 ; there was doubtless a confusion with bound (vinctus). The old doppa gives birth to dobchick (dabchick), iii. 171. In p. 124 stands gib (felis). The old halloves still stands for saints, p. 117, and the allusion here to pilgrimages helps to fix the date of this poem. Wickliffe's knack (dolus) now stands for our knickknack, p. 152 ; toy has undergone a change somewhat similar. A woman in p. 174 steals short endes and mony, hence our odds and ends. Dunbar's adjective trim came South very soon, for it is in p. 153 ; the other adjective trick (trig), soon to be coupled with trim, is in p. 109. The future Shakesperian most unkindest stands in p. 114. The all had been lately developed, it is all your fawt stands in p. 158. In iii. 169 something is done for good and all. In iv. 107 we have twise so muche, where Coverdale was soon to alter the so into our as.

Among the Verbs stand have the last word, I am matched (married), breke her mynde to him. We see keep him short ; Coverdale's tie him short, to lay vice, iv. 106 ; hence our "lay a ghost."

Skelton's jingles were coming into vogue ; a woman gets a man to smick and smack, p. 110 ; bones make clitter clatter, p. 123 ; bible bable, p. 130.

Among the Romance words is assimilate. The word base in p. 110 seems to mean ugly ; it is applied to a baby. The en was in great vogue ; in p. 137 entwit stands for the old ætweit, our twit. In iii. 40 we are told that loyaletè is a good quality in a Prince; we now usually apply the word to a subject. The word gallant is made an Adjective in p. 176, and is applied to dress; brave had already been used in the same sense. In iii. 171 the verb souse bears the meaning of mergere; see p. 266 of my book.

John Palsgrave, a native of London, and a graduate of Paris, brought out his 'L'Éclaircissement de la langue Francoyse' in 1530; this invaluable dictionary he dedicated to Henry VIII., having been tutor in French to the King's sister Mary; the author obtained from the King a grant of copyright for seven years. He has such old words as gong (privy), paddock (rana); and such old forms as croise (crux), rande of befe. The verbs carpe, clepe, stye, and threpe, are here set down as farre Northern words; also the Romance fray (quarrel) with. Certain words as hente (capio) are named as then going out; sperre (claudo) and sperre (rogo) are Northern, and not in common use; the syns and sythe are both used in one sentence, p. 471. The nomme (capio) is nowe none Englysshe; queme (placeo) is out of use. There are very old forms in p. 217; to do make a castell, or to lette make it. The for is still often prefixed to verbs, as fordreynt; the form formast fyngar had not yet become Udall's forefinger. There is Tyndale's new word mysse woman. Palsgrave makes an odd mistake or two; thus in p. 285 he says that to lorne a thing is not used, but we borrow I forlore of the Doutche tonge. The to (dis) in to-breke was now about to disappear; its true force was becoming unknown to the new generation; for all to fyle a gown (inquinare) stands in p. 236; all to sowce in the myar stands in p. 368; this mistake of Mallory's is seen in some of the later Reformers, and even after 1700.

As to the Vowels, the old initial æ is struck out; ætwithan becomes twite (cast in the tethe), p. 308; to twhyte (reproche) is called a Northern term in p. 396. The a is clipped, atire becomes tyre. There is both the old berke and the new barke (latrare); both commende and commaunde appear in p. 192 for recommend. The e replaces u; Lydgate, who is in this work often quoted as an English classic, appears as the Monk of Berye, p. 226. The e is inserted; hower (hora) stands in p. 452. The ie final is clipped; grundeswulie becomes grounde sall (groundsel). The i or y supplants o, as upsyde downe for upsodown, p. 230; here there was a false analogy; there is also to lylle (loll) out the tonge. There are both enquiere and enquyre in p. 226. The two forms bylde and buylde stand close together, p. 163. There is both the old form of the verb keele (refrigerare) and the verb cool, which we adopt. The titmose of 1440 now becomes tytmouse. The verbs toyle and till appear, each with its different sense, in p. 391; the Southern and Northern heirs of the old tylian. The ennoye is used for the French enuye, p. 225. The two forms bery and bury (sepelire) both appear. The French endouer appears both as endowe and endewe, p. 224. The ou replaces i; penthouse of a house; but afterwards comes pentys over a stall.

The p is added to m, as to champ; we see both bunch and punch, forms of one verb. The old sound is still unsoftened in thacke (tegere), but atche (dolor) replaces ake; Kemble the actor was laughed at for pronouncing ache as Palsgrave did. There are both the forms eye and egge for ovum; gane and yane (oscitare); our author first gives Lydgate's foryet, and then his own forget, p. 242. The g is softened; there are both rygge and ridge, referring to land; it is struck out in flemme (phlegm); here spyttell is given in explanation. Palsgrave says that we do not sound h in honest, honour, and a few other words. The d is added in I drownde (drown), p. 221; there are both ledder and lethers. The t is added, as talant (talon); there are both to graffe and to graft; the t is inserted, as heyghten for the old verb hezen. The th is added; there is come to my full grouthe, p. 202, which last word replaces the old grownes. The m replaces b, as somersault; in French, sober-sault. The n is prefixed; the ekename of 1303 becomes nyckename. The l is added; spekke becomes speccle, bidaggen becomes daggyll; in this way a new verb is formed from nose, to nosyll (nuzzle); it seems to have been confounded with nursle (train), and was used in this latter sense throughout this Century. The r is inserted, as frutrer, the French fruyctiers; it is added, as stutter, the old stutte; it replaces n, as periwyncle for pinewincle; it replaces f, as hande kercher, which is used for wiping the nose, p. 410. The sh replaces sc, as "what cometh our shotte to?" the French escot, p. 192. The sh replaces st; there are both the old gnast and the new gnasshe; this last form had been used five years earlier by Tyndale. The robows of 1440 now becomes robrisshe (rubbish). The old French pikeis is corrupted by a false analogy into picke axe. We see convenablement Englished by syttyngly, p. 445, not fittingly.

Among the Substantives we find calver of samon, caste of haukes, childes rattle, a cuttyng of a vyne, dogge fysshe, duckelyng, drepyng (of meat, not the Lancashire dropping), drivelar, gagge (for mouth), gonne poudre, gose berry, hertys ease (the flower), hedge hogge, kynges yvell, Lady daye, mole (talpa), nedyll of a compas, nosegay, oulde mayde, peperquerne, quavemyre (quagmire), sawe dust, schyp owner, schoppe kepar (not shop holder), scrytche houle, a smutche, hote-house (a stew), stoppe (of organs), towne house, clacke clacke of a mill, bombyll bee, syde wynde (opposed to a full wynde), brome (for sweeping), tacklyng, daye breake, by heresay (par ouyr dire). Palsgrave remarks that "in maner all oure abstractis ende in nesse," unless they come from the French. He has curlydnesse (of hair) and proudnesse. The foreign ending let is very seldom tacked on to a Teutonic word; we here find driblet. What we now call a doll appears as a babe. The words schrewe, baud, and harlotte may apply to either man or woman. The word depe is used in a new way, the depe of wynter, p. 231. The word drabbe here means nothing worse than slutte. The word lome means a frame; its old force is therefore narrowed. One craftsman appears as ropar (rope-maker); this gave name to a well-known family. The old word shed is now applied to ground, shedde of an hylle (tertre). Palsgrave explains besynesse by labour, and then refers to besynesse of occupation (negotium). His dogge has two meanings: 1, a beast, chien; 2, a mischevous curre, dogue. The playe of sadde matters is in French moralité, while playe, an enterlude, is in French farce. Cover-dale's daysman (arbiter), still in our Bible, here first appears ; it recalls the old legal diem dicere. We see gadde bee, a flye (our gadfly). A gospellar is one that sings the gospel ; this word was soon to get a new meaning. There is a new construction of man ; I am man good ynough to, etc. ; here we now drop the adjective. When a woman is to be delivered, she says, I am nere my tyme. The word world is more used ; he wyste nat in the worlde what to do, p. 175 ; here we transpose a little ; it is a dangerous worlde now a dayes, p. 243 ; this translates dangereux temps. There is I shall tell him more of my mynde, p. 184 ; my foote is aslepe, exactly the same as in French, p. 269 ; as long as the breth is in my body, p. 453. The word handsome now first means pulcher, for hansomnesse is in French advenanteté. The word nappe has lost its old exalted sense, and here means only a lytell slepe. The old bicker (pugna) is degraded ; byckerynge is here equivalent only to skrymysshe, the French escarmuche ; we know the later form skrimmage. The old wit had been a synonym for wisdom ; but it now stands for ingeniosité, among other things ; its lighter shade of meaning was soon to be developed. The noun spring, in p. 161, gets a new meaning, "something that may be bent or bowed." The word gear means no more than the French chose in p. 239. The word water may stand for sudor ; a horse is all on a water, p. 245 ; we should say, lather. The old wif in compounds is replaced by woman ; the former wif-freond had long vanished ; we now see many forms like woman preest. The French fretillon is Englished by (a) hoppe upon my thombe. Tyndale's new atonement here appears as onement (reconciliation). The French fossette is translated a pytte in ones cheke ; the verb pit had already appeared. We have seen Caxton's barbarous compound sceawage, the show of goods for sale ; the officer, who took toll upon this, had also to see to the cleaning of the streets ; hence he was called scavager ; he appears in Palsgrave as scavenger.¹ One of the names for English slang was a pedlar's frenche, p. 368. The phrase every whyt is thought very English, p. 450 ; the French expressed the last word by goutte ;

Among the new Adjectives are clammy, darkesome, hylly, noppy (of ale), in French, vigoreux; broken backed, dainty mouthed, lyght heeded, þe lyftlong daye, p. 453. The word lyght is used in two different senses, lyght grene and lyght horse. An adverb is made an adjective; as a downeryght strooke, p. 377. The old awkward still appears as an adverb in to ryngc aukewarde (when enemies are coming), like Scott's "the bells are rung backward." But this adverb is now made an adjective, meaning lefte handed, and also expressing the French perverse. It further gives birth to the new adverb awkewardly (frowardly), p. 439. The ish, as in Chaucer, is added to old adjectives of colour, thus expressing a new shade of meaning, as blackysshe, blewishe, and many others; there is seeysse (marin), the Old English sælic. The word daper of 1440 here changes its old sense; it now Englishes mignon. The word homely means not only familiar, but saucy (free and easy). The word fine is used of very small work. The word fond changes from stultus to amans (cynics say that this is no great step); I waxe fonde upon a woman is translated by je m'enamoure, p. 218; the verb dote had already followed the same course. The old elvysse is removed from Fairyland, and here expresses mal tractable, p. 403. The rough is now used of speech; speak roughly, p. 242. The word busy has gained an evil sense; a busy felowe Englishes unq entremetteux, p. 331. The word pretty now expresses parvus; a preaty whyle ago, unq peu de temps passé, p. 453; this great whyle is the English for de long temps, p. 455. An adjective is made a substantive, as the white of the eye or of an egg. Sometimes the substantive is dropped, as draw in blacke and white, a French phrase; to be longe aboute it, p. 237. A fashion is revived of prefixing a substantive to an adjective, like the old blod-read; we now find love sycke, brimme ful. The adjective stedye once more appears, after a sleep of 300 years, p. 234; it is applied to something that does not move, as a wall. We see an alliterative phrase in they keep the day hye and holy (haultement), p. 257. We find earable ground, p. 279, bespeaking a welcome for the kindred arable that had already appeared. There are the phrases a tall man of his handes, as mery as a cricket, as longe as large. The vif ou mort is Englished by alyve or deed, p. 437; so completely had on lif become an adjective. An adjective is placed before a verb, as to roughe heawe timber. Two adjectives are coupled, as lyght grene. An adjective follows a verb, as hacke them small. Our more will still translate major; the more fole is he, p. 452; we have also the fewer the better fare, p. 472.

As to Pronouns, in p. 300 stands and I were as you, I wolde, etc. (si j'estoye que de vous); here we now drop the as. We see sche devyll and many such compounds. The it has a backward reference, as I wyll pass or I wyll dye for it, p. 317. In p. 444 one with another is translated by peste mesle. The all is developed; the by lykelyhode of 1430 becomes by all lykelyhode, p. 439. The word years is dropped after a Numeral, as if she be ones forty, she will, etc., p. 396; here the French inserts ans. So completely had the all and some (omnes et unus) dropped, that Palsgrave blunderingly translates it by tout entierement, p. 448. We find the new every body, a lytell to moche, lytell lesse, fewe ynoughe, you may come tyme ynoughe, p. 375; here an in is dropped. There is the new idiom a great many peces, p. 217; here the of is dropped before the last word; the Teutonic many and the Romance mainê are confused; in p. 463 stands a great meyny of them. There is a curious new phrase, I will offer my offering the first thing I do, p. 308. The quod sciam is Englished in I never did it, that I wotte of, p. 394.

Among the new Verbs are to dog, bear him out (je suporte), blober, blow (after running), break out (as one that waxeth scabby), dasshe out of countenance, dygge my horse with spores, do him servyce, harten a man, go to borde in a place, fall away (wax lean), fall in love with, be in amours with, p. 253, synge out (chanter a playne voyx), to fynger (like a thief), fyer a gonne, a ship grounds, hold at a baye (a la boy), kepe resydence, take him up (reprove), lie at anker, locke up a thing, make myselfe a straunger (je me aliene), the law byndeth you, weather is overcaste, pop into water, cast a shoo, stake (in play), stedye a thing, stricken deer, take herte a gresse (en pance, sudden courage), take into favour, take hym to his legges; take on, as in sorrow; take þe wynde of a man (get wind of), also wind a man, take the worde out of one's mouth, to takyll a ship, thynke scorne to (je ne daigne), toppe a tre, unlerne, my tethe waters to see, etc. (a French phrase), to whytelyme a wall, pyping hote (tout chault), worme etyn, weather beaten, tonge tyed; halfe slepyng, halfe wakynge. Palsgrave is fond of shall where we put will. We see both the forms lye in chylde bedde, and the clipped lye in. There is the expressive trowe mother (putative); I morne is used for "wear mourning." A child is marred, not spoiled. Wood, when burning, crakes; crackle had not yet come. The foreign en is much used before Teutonic words; enbusye myself, embolden, engrave (used of a goldsmith). The Northern verbs stabbe and tire (fatigare) have now come to London, also bonfire. The verb drone is now set apart for the noise of a bagpipe. Men had long baited their horses; they themselves baited in 1530, when they ate at an inn. There is the famous bring him aquaynted with, used by Pope. The je importune is Englished by call upon a man that I have a sute to; hence our visits became calls. The verb cross was used in different senses; to crosse legges, and also cross over the waye. A verb has evidently been formed from sun; for set a sonnyng appears for au soleil, p. 357. The verb cut, like carve, is used for executing very fine work, p. 203. A candle may be either put out or done out, p. 218. The verb scatter, like skale, becomes intransitive; men scatter (go out of order). The verb fret still takes an Accusative, as freat himself away; but the new construction also appears, frete nat for a trifle, p. 242; there is further the other Old English verb fret (ornare). In the same way there is the new kepe close as well as the old kepe you close, with the same meaning. There is both the intransitive geve over (cedere), and the transitive geve a man over. We saw laugh himself to death 140 years earlier; we now have overshote my selfe (je me advise mal), and overslepe my selfe. A strong fellow is said to be well sette or set up. A man is said to starve (die), and to starve for cold; there is also the transitive I starve (famish) a man, p. 373. The verb tryppe now becomes transitive. The verb stoppe is used technically in a game; I will stoppe on your side, p. 375; hence our longstop at cricket. The verb stryke Englishes je lache; it is here, p. 377, applied to letting down a crane; our strike sail had been used centuries earlier; stryke on ground is here applied to a ship. The verb tanne becomes intransitive; it here means be sun-burnt. Palsgrave says of thrill (je penetre), that it is old and little used in his time; we have happily revived it, though we apply it to the soul, not to material objects. The afford of Barclay now seems to get the sense of the Latin dare or something like it; "I forde an article" Englishes je vends; the undoubted sense of dare comes forty years later. The verb gag (suffocare) now takes its more modern sense; it is also made a noun. There is a new sense of gather, where we now say pull; I gather myselve to gyther, for some feat of strength, p. 245. The verb gesse keeps its old sense of calculating in shooting, like ayme; but it is also translated by the French deviner, showing a new sense, p. 245. Two senses of drag are given in p. 219; I dragge for fish, and I dragge (come behind). There is fydell with your handes, p. 236, a new sense of the verb. There are two senses of walk in walke the stretes, and walke a horse. The verb leare Englishes regarder de longue veue, and is applied to a dog behind a door, p. 279. The verb snoffe (anhelare) takes a new sense; not only a horse, but a stubborn boy is said to snoffe; Foxe was fond of this latter sense, expressing anger. The old want (carere) now means egere, and perhaps desiderare; I wante a gowne Englishes j'ay mestier de, etc., p. 400; a few years later the sense of desiderare is clear enough. The old warp becomes intransitive; bordes warpe, p. 401. The verb worship, as is said expressly, is used of honour paid both to God and to man. Palsgrave translates pour tout potaige by whan all is doone and sayd; this he calls a phrasys, p. 427; we transpose his two participles. The old go is still used for ambulare; I can neyther go nor stande, p. 469; we still say of a horse, something in this sense, "he can go well." The old verb hack has a new variation, hucke, p. 265, (mangle, wrangle); hence came our haggle. There is a new phrase, formed from former nouns, he hummeth and haeth, p. 265. The Northern kytlynge appears, used for our kitten; it also gives birth to the verb kyttell (kitten), p. 273. The verb pat gives birth to paddyll (in mire). The verb ryfte is formed from the noun; boards ryfte (gape asunder). Two other verbs are due to whine, p. 407; a child whympers, a horse whynyes. The phrase it came to the joynyng Englishes ce rint a, etc., p. 267; many French phrases were translated literally into our tongue. We find kepe house, and also kepe open house; this last, it seems, was used only of a Prince, p. 272. We see an is struck out in the proverb better plye than breake, p. 319; here, in French, il vault begins the sentence. We see also the Imperative, best do, best have, p. 439. Palsgrave says that English has no way of expressing the verbes inchoatyves of the Latin except by putting wax or begin before adjectives; he gives some pages of these; see p. 402; I could wish that we had more verbs, such as redden and sicken. Both the Participles, waxen and waxed, are given, p. 404. Coverdale's confusion of the Participle and Verbal Noun appears here; be doynge of something stands in p. 425. The French par estudier is Englished thus, by studyeng, p. 439.

Among the Adverbs are darkelyng, runne a heed (ahead), slopewise, wherabouts? no where at al, a syde wyse (a costière), halfe waye (en my chemyn), selfwylledly, shortly (in the sense of mox), ever syns, for ever and a daye (a grant jamays), agayne and agayne (encore et derechief), no where els, nay truely, whether I wyll or nat. We see stand a strydlyng (with legs abroad), hence a new verb was to be coined later. We also see the adverb sydelyng (de cousté), which gave birth to the verb sidle long afterwards; grovel is another instance of a verb mistakenly formed from an adverb. There is the Shakesperian anon, anon (tout mayntenant). An unusual adverbial form appears in fully fedde. In p. 441 stands happely luckely (par bon eur); in Arber's 'English Garner,' iv. 641, Cromwell's redcoats ask if they are to fall on in order, or happy-go-lucky. In p. 445 stands so so, to English tellement quellement, je me porte. There was an odd fashion, very common later in the Century, of repeating too (nimis); in p. 452 stands to to moche (par trop). In p. 461 we see it is so, which is here called a very strong affirmative; hence the favourite American that's so. The come away! is translated by viens avant, viste! this might also be Englished by come at ones! p. 461; it is our later come along! Palsgrave remarks on the legal use of whereas, p. 472. The but is developed; I wyll folowe tyll to morow but I wyll fynde her, p. 239, it shall go harde but, etc., p. 236, but now (a prime), p. 423. Palsgrave says that is my lorde uppe? is a peculiar English phrase, p. 417. He has as well as well may be, remarking that the French do not repeat the well a second time, p. 438; there is also as sone as maye be, p. 420. His far from makynge an ende is a translation of bien loyng de, p. 457. Tyndale here had inserted an off after the far.

Among the Prepositions we see hande to hande, under a locke and keye, over heed and cares, at unwares, at tymes, bytvene whyles, up the hyll and downe the dale (amont et aval), p. 436, cheke by cheke (joe a joe), in play. The out, as of old, is prefixed to nouns, as an out place, explained as "a corner out of the waye." In p. 230 men do a thing upon a full stomacke; here the idea expressed by the Latin post seems to encroach on the idea connected with super.¹ There is a new phrase in p. 231, fall behynde þe hande (in debt); a few years later þe was dropped. Our favourite betting phrase appears in p. 357, twenty to one he is ondone; see p. 358 of my book. Palsgrave says that to and unto are used indifferently, but the latter is Northern, p. 436. The old idiom with of, first seen in Layamon, is extended; it is a fayre syght of a woman when she is well tyred (dressed), p. 391. The of is dropped in is the money weyght? p. 400, (de poyx). The old now a dayes is expanded into nowe at these dayes, p. 401; a great mistake. We do a thing against the grain; Palsgrave did it agaynst þe heare (hair), which he explains by frowardly; the phrase lasted till Shakespere's time. The old at ones had meant simul; in p. 461 it means statim.

Among the Interjections are houische ! mom ! ye suerly ! God blesse you ! God be thanked ! If a man sneezed, his neighbours cried, Christ helpe ! the French synonym for this was much longer, p. 460. Palsgrave compares par la mort bieu ! (morbleu) to the English by cockes body ! in either case the name of the Deity was disguised, p. 460. He gives many French curses without English equivalents; p. 461.

Among the words akin to the German and Dutch are lynke (torch), waynscot, rabbit, to gulp, drone (sonare), leer, to quiver, snarre (snarl), lymp (boiteux). A yonker is the French ung rustre (an uncouth rustic), p. 322. There is the verb dandyll, the daunt of 1303, used by Robert of Brunne.

The Scandinavian words are fillip, flag (vexillum), smutch, stale (urina), dug, cuffe (ferire), tip, as a cart tips over, symper (our simmer), rowse himself; that is, stretch himself before action. There is "fall in a dumpe," p. 222, which as yet means only to muse. There is hugge (shrink in bed for cold). The swagge of 1303 is here used of a fat man's belly; hence the swag-bellied Hollander, and also the later swagger. To look aswhasshe (lorgner) is a token of pride, p. 284; hence comes the later swashbuckler. There is jump; that is, leap with both feet held together, p. 269.

The Celtic words are cub and agog.

Among the Romance words are dandelyon, cabestain (capstan), cordiall medicyne, coveryng for a book, flagon, gaberdyne, gauger of wyne, grayne to dye with, heed pece, leaver (the engine), meson sayle (mizen, in French mysayne), pacquet, pensy floure, pyppen, plomet, porkepyn, rascall refuse, beest, redysshe (an herb), rollar or rammer of husbandrie, rounde daunce, sorrel (of a horse), spynnage, surge of sea, toyll (used in hunting), costive, imprennable, massy, perspectyfe (beholding with the eye), scrupulouse, to calke (a ship), to cyfer, consommate (make a full end of), dis-apoynte, disarme, blottyng paper, bastylment (battlement), to engrosse writing, entune an organ, to equate, to extorcyon a thing, face him downe, farce, fryske (une frisque), tryfle with my hands, force him to, etc., a frycasse, gestyll (jostle), payster (pester), grapple, to ayr clothes, to brush clothes, launsyng yron, levell a gonne, muffle, to panell a quest, to pece a thing, to pomell, potche eggs, to prompte (a schoolboy), to prostytute, retrieve (as a hound), to rule paper with a ruler, letter of marke, to somme an account, to sorte things, mayster of ship (pilote in French), pair of virgynals (espinettes), ventylate matters abroad, unmarry, whoop (je huppe), modes, tenses, in partyculer, poorely (malè), sommaryly. Palsgrave uses bachelor for nat maryed, and syngle man for the French bachelier. He has the old bace playe for jeu aux barres, our prisoner's base. Like Tyndale, he uses cattell in the Northern sense of betail. The word fasyon expresses the French mode, and also taille and facon. We see grauntfather's father stand for aieul, and grantfather grantsyre for grant aieul or atave; a little lower comes great grauntfather. There is man nourse, something like the later man midwife. The word portlynesse expresses the French magnificence. The French cordon translates Seynt Audries lace; whence came tawdry in later times. The syse of a man's body is rendered by the French corpulence. Their piratte might be Englished by a venturer on the see; this last phrase a little later was to stand for a merchant. The word precyse, taken from France, here means scrupulously cyrcumspecte; men may be utterly precisye in speaking, p. 466. The word rampysshe (ramponneux) may be applied to a beast or a wench; it is in our time rampageous. Palsgrave says that nothing in French or English can go beyond millions. The noun courrant appears as an English word, and is used in connexion with a gutter, p. 156. The verb bray is still used of deer, or any other beast. The verb cable (very unlike our use of it) means "store a ship with cables." There is the oath, God confounde me! Roy had used the verb conjecture; Palsgrave has, I conjected as moche. We find cry haroll alarome, in French, harol alarme. We see deduce used in connexion with argument, deducte in connexion with arithmetic; the Infinitive and Participle of the Latin verb contribute each one form of the word. The verb meurs is Englished by parte my lyfe; our present form depart this life was to come a few years later. There is deprive a man; here of his office is dropped. We see desyre to dinner; this verb, like bid, meant both jubere and precari. The old verb spillan is now found in the form of dispoil (our spoil); this Englishes the French gaster; the other and rightful sense of the English word desrober is given afterwards. The form differ is written where we put defer. The word solen (sullen) has no worse meaning here than pencif. We have first provisyon of meate (vivres); then provision of any other thymg (pourvoyance). We see I am out of temper, referring to body, not mind; afterwards, I temper my selfe, referring to abstinence from anger, p. 387; to distemper refers to the body, meaning bring out of frame. The word passyon stands for ira, p. 388. A horse covers a mare; and a man is uncovered when he doffs his hat, p. 398. The j'adresse is Englished by dyrect a letter to. The word pece, as also in French, expresses cannon, p. 308. There are the two words nicenesse and niceté; nycely will express both coyement and coyntement, p. 443. The English coy is as much as strange or nyse (fastidious). The word lussyous may be applied to meat; it here implies an unpleasant sweetness. The word patron may mean either a helper or an example. The word glosse will now express colour; the glosse of satyn, p. 211; in French, lustre. The curious French synonym ung gallant is given for our marchaunt, p. 200. Two French verbs are given for the English doute; douter and craindre. The verb endyte bears three meanings in p. 225; endyte of trespasse; also, to penne something, and to compose. Our esteme here means nothing more than to appraise, p. 229. The verb expleyt (explicitare) bears the true old French sense of achieve; in our day, when we exploit a thing, we achieve profit from it; Palsgrave's exploit bears a new sense, to be found in Comines; to work so hard, p. 230. The French payssant is Englished by one of the countraye, p. 265; hence our countryman (rusticus). We had long known trifles; we now see a tryfflyng mater, p. 281. The phrase strayne courteysie implies here an exaggeration of politeness, as one doth that is nyce. Palsgrave remarks that there is no French idiom answering to our take peper in þe nose, whence comes peppery. We hear of a mynsynge pace, p. 437 (le pas menu); here the verb mince gets a new sense. Two substantives are coupled in a dutie dette. The word usher (ostiarus) gets a new sense, that of the hushher of a school; Palsgrave perhaps derived it from hush. There are the two forms of one verb, distylle and stylle. The de is clipped, when defens toy is Englished by fende thy selfe, p. 234; we now insert a for after the verb. The origin of our pikestaff is very plain, when we read of a staffe well pyked with yron, p. 316. We have heard of the game of faro; in p. 233 stands I fare (play at dice, at a game so named). The word dandyprat, so common in this Century, is French, meaning a coin, p. 198. A tryumph in p. 237 is said to be something like a tournament. The word manner gets its Shakesperian sense, "to the manner born," I fynde one with the maner (trouver sur le fait), p. 236; also, take him with the maner (sur le fait), like a thief, p. 385. The French en is much used at the beginning of words; there are both enspyre and inspyre. We know a woman's front; je effronte is given in p. 243 for to fronte up, as a woman does her hair; effrontery was as yet uncoined; in the next page a woman's bonnet is mentioned. The verb geste (jocari) appears in p. 245; it also bears the meaning of rayle upon, our later rally; here rail loses its old harsh sense. The ending fy for verbs was coming in; but Palsgrave remarks that the verb rubyfye had not been admitted into common speech; the verb surmount, according to him, is a late comer; Lydgate's verb fiche is by this time obsolete. There is the curious I saynte (I become a saint), leading to Pope's "sinner it or saint it." Either a man or a horse may trotte aboute, p. 394. There is a new sense of the verb use; "use bad words to a man," p. 400. We see retayle contrasted with what men sell hole, p. 440. There is the new phrase hate me like poyson, p. 259; also, stand upon his promocyon (sur le point de), p. 263; hence the later on sale, on the mend. The old gilofre becomes gylowfloure, p. 364, from a false analogy. A seal may be called an antique, p. 323, following the French. We hear of the nobylyte (nobles) of the realm. The crowche in Crowchemesse day preserves the old sound of the vowel in cruc-em, p. 425. The French a haulte voyx is Englished by in a Pylates voyce, p. 442, showing the popularity of the old Mysteries. The French ma mayson becomes my poore house, p. 420. The old quyte (omnino) was coming in again, p. 378. There is the new phrase in the very myddes of, p. 431; also, at the very beginning (au fin commencement); also, very fewe. This very comes often, just sometimes; in p. 461 juste is set down as an affirmative. The French Singular par ce moyen is Englished by by this meanes, p. 440; and en nulle manière thus, by no maner of meanes, p. 439. From the Italian comes monkey (monicchio, monna). There is the cork (of a bottle) from the Spanish.

Palsgrave, in the beginning of his book, mourns that the Latin tongue is so ill pronounced in England, and thinks that this comes from Latin and French being taught jointly. He himself has advoultry, the curious compound of the two languages, p. 218. He distinguishes the Picard and Walloon from the French of Paris. In p. 160 he contrasts certain olde Romant words, out of use in his day, with the modern French. He tells us that Lydgate's obsolete words are mostly French, p. 242. When treating of the noun standard he mentions St. Cuthbert's banner as in England most nearly answering to the Oriflamme. He gives us the proverb, two wyttes be farre better than one, p. 269; also, thou lokest after deed mens shoes, p. 307; a day afore þe fayre is given as an adage applicable to one that cometh too late, p. 419; Heywood slightly changed this a few years later.

Mr. Furnivall has printed 'Jyl of Brentford's Testament,' dating from about 1530. There is the name Jyllian; score here means the reckoning, p. 14; the word toyes suggests the idea of amusement in p. 9; the word qualm, p. 15, losing its old serious meaning of mors, stands for no more than a pain or stitch. We see whypstoke, a word of abuse, whence came Shakespere's whipster. In p. 19 stands a hedge Curat. In this Century, and indeed till 1710, woodcok was much used for stultus; we see as wyse as a woodcok, with as moche wit as a calf. There is a curious ellipse in p. 14, a mayde that marryeth, not caryng whom. The verb scyll takes a new meaning, that of bibere, p. 7. In p. 14 stands make a stay. There is the Scandinavian jomp, p. 14 (exactly), which has influenced Shakespere. Among the Romance words are strangury, dyaculum; we hear of the passyng bel, p. 13. There is presuppose and the common yf ye please, p. 15. In p. 9 stands the saw, the poore mare shall have his man agayn; this is transposed in Shakespere; I have met with the later version of this in Scotch letters about 1780.

The poem of 'Christis Kirk on the Green' (printed by Dr. Rogers among the works of James I.) seems to me not to date from before 1530; there is here the word younker, which did not come in long before that year, and loun is not much earlier. There are Jok and Lowry; a man dancing is called Lightfute. The old Northern nais (pudibundus) of 1320 reappears as nyss, applied to girls. There is the phrase to nowt powis (knock heads), used later by Davie Deans. We see the Scandinavian word byre, answering to the Old English bur or bower; it is noticed by the Yorkshireman Levins forty years later.

In a piece of 1533, referred to in Collier's 'Dramatic Poetry,' 1879, vol. ii., we find in p. 300 the phrase her dieng day.

There are some plays of Heywood (Percy Society, vol. xx.) which belong to 1533. In p. xliii. we see the form ie used for aye (semper); this was to be cut down to i later in the Century. There is squib, derived from the Icelandic svipa, to flash or dart; wittiness, a nody (stultus), a jar (rixa), which here means a difference between two words, p. 17. A person is missing, p. xxi., which must stand for in missing, like in owing. The verb glance at gets the new meaning of hinting or touching upon, p. 12. There is make an appointment. We have seen Barbour's on paim! we now have at him! p. 49. In p. xlv. stands for his life (he) daryth not, etc.; this is as absurd a change as to write he cans for potest. There are the Romance close weather, overjoyed, an incident, undowtydly, paymaster. A man may be carried away by his will. There is our common of corse, p. 28, I think, for the first time. P. 17 is a most curious page, which ought to be bracketed with Barrow's famous definition of wit. I give some of the lines of the dialogue—

“ Why, what dyfferens between wyse and wytty ?

As much sometyme as between wysdom and folly.

Men can in no wise be wise without wytt.

No ! and men may have gret wytt and wisdom nought,
Wytt is the wurker of all perseyyng,
And indifferent to good or yll wurking.

Wysdom ys in good part taken alweys.”

The man who broaches this evidently new distinction is called some young schoolman and fresh comonar ; the theory is called a jar. The whole passage is most curious, showing that wit is no longer, as of old, to stand for sapientia and nothing else.

In 1532 glimpses of the future English horse-race begin to appear. As we learn from Mr. Hore's ‘History of Newmarket,’ i. 61, the King's horses are run in that year ; the boys that run them have caps made by the mylanner, a man most unlike the modern milliner. In 1540 a prize is given by the authorities at Chester to the man who runs best on horseback ; see p. 65, where the rules of the course are set out.

Sir Thomas Elyot brought out his book, called ‘The Governour,’ in 1531 ; I have used the reprint by Eliot in 1834. The r is added ; Hampole's verb low now becomes lower, p. 24. Among the Substantives we see a long summer's day, p. 23, forwardness (activity), the head of a discourse. Elyot speaks in p. 42 of sharpness of wit, called in Latin acumen. The word wit expresses sapiens, not mens, pp. 59 and 162 ; the man, not the thing ; a great change. The word understanding undergoes a change, for it is used of the intention common to two parties in a bargain, p. 181. The term good fellowship was applied to soften the harsher term gluttony, p. 87. The word Gospel is used for verus ; we hear in p. 266 that Æsop did not write Gospels. The word play is used of the method used by a gamester, p. 86 ; a man's play is suspected. The old handgun becomes simply gun in p. 93, as if it was a cannon. Elyot describes the football of his day as nothing but beastly fury and extreme violence, p. 92 ; this complaint is repeated fifty years later. Among the Adjectives is doggish. The word tall takes the new sense of procerus, p. 220. The pronoun is used in a new construction, where a Participle seems to be dropped, "Moses aided the multitude, and they most unstable," p. 137. There is the phrase I nothing doubt, showing the connexion between noht (nihil) and not, p. 245.

Among the Verbs are to game, unteach, rouse game, keep time (in dancing), something to work on, p. 77, man a ship, it is to be wished, throw a rider, moulder, grind colours, raise the siege. The verb fling, still intransitive, is used of horses, p. 9. The verb sprengen was doubtless confused with springen ; for to spring birds stands in p. 56. The verb mote, our moot, becomes transitive, to mote a case, p. 36. Gower had talked of things wearing out ; in p. 43 members of the body wear more hard. With us dogs yap ; in p. 55 they yawn, meaning the same. The old gelyfan (permittere) now becomes confused with læfan (relinquere) ; leave them no time stands in p. 77. The verb forbear is followed by an Infinitive, forbear to speak, p. 83. The old Adverbial wunder, as in wunder strong, is now replaced ; wonderful elegantly stands in p. 224. The by is dropped after a Comparative, he was not the richer one halpenny, p. 231, like the old a hundred fold more.

Among the Romance words are inferiors, declamation, elocution, retain a lawyer, pleadings, exordium, civilian (lawyer), grumble, battle axe, to vault (vault), qualify, reduce, intensely, roundes (dances), altercation, unities, with effect, maniac, mania, adult, adolescence, countermand, good people (men), definition, frugality, insignia, in a rage, tract of time (mora), timorosity, valiance (valiantness), scale walls, goal, consolidate, intimation, enterlace, vegetative, exquisite (of torments), sophisms, obstinacy, to forage. We have rejected Elyot's verbs erogate and radicate. He adverts to a strange sense of the word commoner in p. 2 ; this is applied to burghers who are neither aldermen nor sheriffs. There are two different senses of engine in pp. 25 and 179, machine and subtilty ; it was confused with gin. The word property gets a further meaning, that of our propriety, p. 41 ; we are happy here in having both the Latin form and its French corruption to express two distinct ideas. The old tutor (guardian) now gets the usual sense of the word in our day, a director of study, p. 44. In p. 80 affection stands for partiality; while in p. 136, what we call the affections of the mind, appear as the affectes; but in p. 222 obstinacy is called an affection. The verb commit gets a new technical sense, a judge commits to prison, p. 124. In p. 137 the Adjective individual is opposed to public, much as personal was to be used seventy years later. In p. 147 we hear that with bounteousness (liberality) bounty is diminished; the latter noun seems here to be at last connected with almsgiving. In p. 264 the four Gospels are one context of an history; the word is not yet used in our sense, the circumstance of old. A man of honour in p. 269 means only a man held in honour for his rank or riches. There is the phrase to despatch matters. The word rythm appears in p. 41, connected with metre and harmony; this was later to encroach on the Teutonic rime.

There are many definitions in Elyot; profit is our weal, p. 2; a thema is the head of a declamation, p. 36. He usurps the word maturity, p. 73, to express the mean between sluggishness and haste. He says that providence, p. 76, is so noble a thing that it is attributed to God as well as to Kings; industry had not been used in English so long as providence, and the former in 1531 meant "speedy invention," p. 76. The word modesty (moderation) had not been known in English until very lately, p. 83; discretion was the name improperly given to this virtue. A mild man was wrongly said to be "of a great modesty;" mansuetude, according to Elyot, would here have been the right term to use, p. 84; wise men are exhorted to receive the new word. The quality humanity, p. 133 (it now means something higher than courtesy), is said to be made up of benevolence, beneficence, and liberality. The second of these qualities can be taken only in a good sense; the third may mean sheer prodigality. The vice ingratitude was commonly called unkindness, p. 156. In p. 185 the word faith is applied to our confidence in God; trust to our confidence in our fellow-men, and this becomes credence in contracts; a servant or subject shows fidelity, or the new revived French term loyalty to his sovereign or master; I may here remark that sovereign is now no longer applied to the master of a servant; and the term loyal, as used by Barclay (the old lel is no longer found in the South), seems to have been a new importation from France. Elyot speaks of repulse in p. 216, which the vulgar call "putting back from promotion." The word magnanimity had just been brought in, p. 218; but some opponents of change, we hear, were content with nothing out of their accustomed mumpsimus. The names of sobriety and frugality were strange to all but Latin scholars, p. 245; sobreté had certainly been used in Kent all but 200 years earlier. In p. 252 sapience is called a more elegant word than wisdom. In p. 258 intelligence, we are told, is used for an elegant word, especially in messages between princes; Elyot is not satisfied with understanding when he wishes to express intellectus. The Latin calumnia was Englished by detractation, p. 271. In p. 274 a broad line is drawn between counsel and consultation. Elyot uses the new French verb fatigue as well as Barclay's Latin fatigate. There is a curious survival of an old French adverbial phrase in par amours, p. 249; it had long been known in England. Nowhere more clearly than in Elyot's work is seen the vast influence that Latin and Greek were to have upon English; Henry VIII. (Preface, xxiv.) admired the book, and rejoiced in this augmentation of our language; the best thoughts of Aristotle were now brought within the reach of all. Elyot, in p. 84, declares that England had hitherto lagged behind France, Italy, and Germany, in the matter of translations from Greek and Latin. He says, in p. 73, that some words, lately come out of Italy and France, had been made denizens in England.

He tells us, in p. 55, that the hunting of the fox with running hound is not to be compared with other sports, being much inferior; it is used in deep winter, when other game is unseasonable. There was an alarming waste of poultry, which were used up in feeding hawks, p. 56. He gives the saying, "he that sweareth deep, sweareth like a lord," p. 87; the phrase long afterwards was "drunk as a lord." The oath by the Mass had become so simple a thing that the nobles had abandoned it to the common folk, p. 196.

Elyot (Preface, x.) was the author of a work called 'the lyttle Pasquill;' the first instance, I think, of the Roman Pasquino appearing in England.

George Joy brought out an Apology to Tyndale in 1535 (Arber's Reprint), the apology being a sharp invective. Here we see magry (maugre), to cyte (quote); it is the old ascite; the forms pistle (epistola) and soulis (animæ) are still in constant use. The foreign Deutsch is written Dewche, showing the old German sound of the word. There is vyward, p. 44, with a new letter at the end. Among the Substantives are fore leader, p. 18; we see why the fore horse is called a leader. The classics appear as the tongues, p. 11; here the old tung imitates a French form. The noun enseer is coined (one who sees into), p. 20. We hear of swimming with a corke, p. 23. The adjective sleyght (parvus) has now made its way to London from the North. There is the phrase I said so (as) muche (all this), p. viii.

Among the Verbs videtur appears in a new guise; he wolde seme to flitte, p. 47; this differs from the it sholde seme that of 1400. There are the phrases put his name thereto, cal it agein into his hande (withdraw it from circulation), sette a boke (in print, p. 20), wink at it, steke to it (hære). There is the curt Passive Participle admitted that, etc., yet, p. 14. We see the new verb, to englisshe a word, p. 9.

The Dutch coin stuver appears in p. 22. Among the Romance words are cavillacion, derive, absurdities, yronious (ironical), places (passages of his writing), concordances, table (at the end of a book), prints (editions of a book), to exagger, exasperate, impinge (impute), refrigery, accidence (grammar). What we call crotchetty disposition was known in 1535 as curiositie, p. x. We see text, note, glose, scholia, all in p. 23; elsewhere a text is used for a verse of Scripture. The Latin gaudium is Englished by the gaudye (joy) in p. 18;

hence the gaudy day at our Universities. The word touche is used for trick, p. 25; these two nouns ran a parallel course. There is the strange phrase his comon sencis, p. 36. There is the new word antithesis, p. 17, which is so new that it is explained by English words. The two rival scholars debated fiercely the meaning of resurrectio, p. 10.

Many of the Letters on the Suppression of the Monasteries (Camden Society) were written between 1528 and 1537. We may remark the Northern phrases of the well-known Dr. Layton; he has vara (very), anempsce (anent); he is one of the last to use other for the Latin aut. He continues the delicacy first observable in England about 1300; for he turns into Latin his account of certain filthy vices of the monks, when writing to Cromwell, p. 97. This great minister himself, though a Surrey man, writes aige, not age; the Northern pronunciation was pushing its way to London. We see the verb aleyne (our aliene), p. 86. The ow (French ou) was getting the sound of o, for a well-known Bishop often writes his name Barlo. The Abbey of Rewley, near Oxford, was still known as Royallyeu, p. 73; here the oy bears the sound of French ou; but Vale Royal is still written Valerayall, p. 245. The great Duns Scotus becomes Dunce in p. 71; the Abbey of Jervaux is written Jarvaxe, p. 164; x might still bear the sound of s.

Among the new Substantives are idler, wonderment, monkery; we read of sheytes of paper, at dethes doore, the trade (cursus) of worldly things, p. 104, fine groundes (pastures), p. 158. We see the old form Allsowllen College at Oxford, p. 70; such a Southern form could never have lasted at Cambridge till this time. In the work before us the phrase New Learning is used for the ideas opposed to Roman doctrine, not for the ideas of Erasmus; this usage began about 1532, and lasted long; see pp. 14 and 216.

Among the Adjectives there is the old form costlow (costly). In p. 129 an adjective is made a substantive, dyvers worshyppfulles. We see at utermoste, p. 72, referring to time, where we should say, at the outside.

Among the Verbs are wede out brethren, she bestyrrede hir stumpis. The verb rove takes the sense of errare, p. 108;

Gower's rover (pirata) had already appeared. There is the curious idiom, on Sondaye was senyghte I delivered, etc., p. 90; here the was is soon to disappear.

Among the Adverbs, are learning goes forwardes (goes on), p. 73, an old phrase. An abbot talks of coming upwardes, p. 245; that is, up to London. An abbey is said to be behynde hande (in debt), p. 155; Palsgrave's the before the noun is here struck out.

As to Prepositions, they are often dropped altogether, as unworthye a cure, p. 103, to trust men, p. 156, ryde downe one syde (of Yorkshire), and cum up the other, p. 156; here a through must be dropped after downe and up. Sometimes it is the noun that is dropped after a preposition, as two thousand sheep or very nere, p. 151 (very near that number). We see hys name is to it, p. 10, keys to the dore, p. 67, indebted in great sommes, p. 105. The of, not off, is used to express distance in within ten miles of it, p. 157.

Among the Romance words are undecised (undecided), sertifycat, sinisterly, disafected (unwilling, p. 33), porter's lodge, stipend, quadrant court (quadrangle), filial, decent (becoming), interestes, donor. The old verb ensue becomes intransitive in p. 32, just as we use it. The verb attempt (make trial of) is applied to a person, p. 53; we now use it only of things. The word desperate is used as a term of abuse, p. 76; a desperate knave. Something unpleasant is called a tragedie, p. 76. A former possessor is called a quondam, p. 93; we hear of the seniors of a convent; other Latin phrases are alter ego, ex tempore. A man does a thing exteryally and really, p. 161; the last adverb, a novelty, means "in outward act," as we see by the context. The word comynes (commons) is used of fields in p. 151. The title of honour, the kinges majesty, was now beginning to supplant the former, the king's highness; see p. 141.

In 'Ellis' Letters,' between 1525 and 1537, we remark how strongly the e was sounded in Alain (Archbishop Allen), reaport; there is also Padway (Padua). The a trespasses on other letters; there is Larans for Lawrence, showing one sound of the old au, and the origin of the Irish Larry, so different from the Scotch Lowry; there is the verb alot for Layamon's iloten; here perhaps there was a confusion with the French. The initial a is clipped; we read of a merchant ventrer, not adventurer. The e is dropped, when Chanstar is written for chancellor. We see Beauly written for Beaulieu, much as its last syllable is sounded now; there is the name Peyto, borne by the future Cardinal, a name coming from Peytow, Poitou. There is Tunstall's foloyth (sequitur), showing how the o and the y were disjoined. We see plesewre, something like our present sound of the word. Anne Boleyn is styled Marcus Pembroke, a contraction of Chaucer's markisesse.

As to Consonants, Cromwell often writes Gipswich, where we now clip the first letter; there are both sawer and sawyer. There are the two forms Milnar and Miller, referring to one man. The r is struck out, for there are rubysse and Barnacastell; Barnard Castle is still pronounced something like this by the natives. The w in Cromwell's name is struck out, as Cromell; the Irish still talk of the curse of Crummel. The old surely is now spelt showrly by Queen Mary, Henry's sister, much as we now sound the word, though the old form sowr comes directly afterwards.

Among the new Substantives is draye (plaustrum). We hear of red dere, fowle (chicken), wild foule. There are the phrases my wind was short, gone over the watter, (mare), a good dische (cibus), his maner of going (going on), bord waxis. Rastell, More's brother-in-law, talks of the trade of my living (printing and pleading); this trade was beginning to supplant the old craft. A man says that he has paid litel lak of 5, etc.; we should now substitute short for lak. A man talks of compounding many waters; hence our "strong waters." The use of things in our "state of things" is curious; we here see the condicion of the things ther.

Among the Adjectives we see the expression, "the thickest of the theves," "a rawe sort of religious persons," in this last instance the adjective is transferred from things to men. Pole, being a favourite with foreigners, is called "their wyte God;" in Ireland they still talk of "their white-headed boy."

As to Pronouns, we see the phrase I have yours, where a letter of is suppressed. One letter ends, your owne to the most of his power and dayely orator. The it is repeated in hitt was never mery in England since, etc. One of the Irish Butlers writes, "he is his right hand, and who but he;" a curious new phrase (Series ii., vol. ii. p. 48).

Among the Verbs we find bind him prentis, strike it out, begin the world again, go from my promise, make no dowt but, believe the best of him, see no necessitee, why, etc., put into print, make ruffeling (trouble), put his hand to it (sign it), put it in their heads, she will sit upon my skyrtes. The Earl of Oxford, when fox-hunting in 1533, let his friends see game (sport), Series iii., vol. i. p. 339. There is the phrase the more shame to him, where is is dropped. The well-known Father Forrest, being ungrammatical, is said to "breke Master Precyens (Priscian's) hede." The verb bend expresses eagerness; "they were bent to die."

Among the Adverbs we see oldly (of old), I am not so sur but, etc.; here the so expresses valdè, as in Chaucer; shure (instead of surely). There is the phrase ask how nere I had done, where nere stands for nearly, as in 1280. We have a new phrase for "being a knave;" like the false knave that I was, where like is not wanted. Complaint is made of a haughty Dean, who enters into my ground lyke an hemprowr (emperor).

Among the Prepositions are found "ride in poste to;" here we now drop in.

We see the Romance porsuits, evict, label, ineptione (folly), comyssary, post horses, pay day, accidents (evil occurrences), rapt (raptures), he is fyxed to have it, have course (coursing of greyhounds), dowagier, the scope (aim), plede gyltye, engenious, utensiles, to abuse them selvys (peccare), it succedeth well with him. We read of blake rent (mail) in connexion with Ireland; jugement stands for wisdom. The verbs inculke and corobor are borrowed from the Latin; to these we now add ate. Cromwell's son, a lad about thirteen, is called Maister Gregory; the first time that this title is applied to a boy as we use it now. Men are in trouble; that is, harassed. We have a cluster of strange words in Series iii., vol. ii. p. 242, muske catt, munkkey, cambyrk, and three potts of erthe payntid callyd Porseland (porcelain). The word placard, as in Flanders, is used for government orders. Both minds are satisfied, and arguments are satisfied; that is, answered. About this time the lesser Monasteries were being dissolved; we therefore light upon the words ruinous, deface, suppress, bill of sale; Leigh is called a director (visitor) of Monasteries. An apparatus for a sham monastic miracle is called a manage. Young Cromwell takes lessons in the naturell and true kynde of pronuntiacion (of English).

Many documents are printed by Foxe, ranging from 1525 to 1537. Among the Substantives we remark forlorn hope (milites). The suffix ling is used in a scornful sense; as worldling, blindling; fledgeling was to come later. We see the Verbal Noun grazing; also Audlay's old phrase, the livings of parsons, iv. 611, though the old form lifestode is still found. We have at the first blush; me, for lack of a better.

Among the verbs we see Skelton's snap (here put for snatch, v. 78). There is rip up injuries, bolster up, put two (reasons) together, keep a good tongue in his head. The Chancellor applies the jingle wedded and bedded to Queen Katherine and her first husband.

We see the phrase stand unto it, where unto supplants the old by.

Bonner repeats the proverb of 1400; Good wine needeth no tavern-bush to utter it, v. 78.

Among the Romance words are assuredness, requisites, trumpery, in all events, conduct (sapientia); the Emperor's party are called the Imperials. Frith talks of surging seas and their bar. More uses the verb pule. In iv. 697 Tunstall uses the noun tryal for endeavour; a sense hardly ever found in this Century; our try was gaining the sense of conari, besides that of examinare; the connecting link between the two senses seems to be "try your hand on," etc. We read of a budget of books; the word had formerly meant only a purse. Bayfield, who was a priest, talks of reading a common lecture in a church; that is, preaching a sermon. Sadler writes of ballads and infamous libels; this last noun was beginning to gain an evil meaning. We see tract; but it here means mora. We have seen the Northern verb tent formed from tendo; we have now the new meaning tend (incline). Wolsey (writing in his Master's name) sends a depeach to his agents at Rome, a model of bad English, iv. 601; among his words are re-integrate, excogitate, jacture, cautele, facily, trutinate, pollicitations, presidie, pusillanim; he talks of men sure to the King's devotion, a new sense of the last word. Foxe says he will make his readers some pastime, in beholding the glorious style of this vain-glorious Cardinal; our gross terms are too low for the high Prelate. Foxe translates the Cardinal's new-fangled accede by come, indue by not due, demore by tarry. When Foxe comes to impesse, he says, "Search here thy dictionaries, good reader! for this eloquence passeth my intelligence." Wolsey's first sentence in this despatch is, I think, the longest sentence (out of a law deed) ever written in English.

In Wood's 'Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies,' vol. ii., we see the curious form Salopshire, p. 167. A blast stands for "slander," p. 55. A letter is signed "by the rude fist of your servant," p. 23; this phrase is still used in connexion with writing. A lady complains that she is in a taking, p. 90, where we should use predicament; the old phrase is used by Cranmer about this time. The address your ladyship is now in constant use; also good madam, addressed to an aunt by marriage, p. 90. A lady signs a letter, by yours ever assured, p. 228; there is in p. 120 you be much his friend. A girl overgrows her apparel, a new verb, p. 217. Instead of farewell, we see fare you well, where the Pronoun is not wanted, p. 51. There is I dare be bound for her (I'll be bound), p. 81; go high, in bidding, p. 166; in time coming, p. 288. A man sticks (to be discharged), p. 108; hence our stickle. As to the Prepositions, we see "within one mile of me;" "she was out of apparel;" "to the best of my power."

As to the Romance words, the old praise, meaning æstimare, now becomes appraise, p. 164. The word resign, no Accusative following, was brought into fashion by the dissolution of the Monasteries, p. 153. Anne Boleyn writes in behalf of a York monk, one dompne John Eldmer, p. 191; the old monk's title dan or don seems to have paved the way for the Scotch dominie. The title Mistress Bridget is used of a little girl, a Lord's daughter, p. 213. There was much disputing as to whether the Lady Mary should have the rather new title of Princess. We hear of a case being proved against a person, p. 34, meaning "charge of misconduct." A man, who wants a priest, is provided, p. 58; I have heard in Scotland people, with their plates full, say, "I am provided." There are the words convalescent, a moderate sermon, p. 187, middle aged, rosewater, a lord's creation robes, p. 104, a small remain (not yet the Plural remains), p. 108, two changes (of raiment), p. 313, a pill, given to the Lady Mary, p. 245. There is my Lord Privy Seal; esquire for the body to the King.

In Cranmer's 'Remains and Letters' (Parker Society) of this time, he calls himself a poor wretch, when writing to the King, p. 237. There is free school, your good lady, new lernyd men (Protestants), p. 302; the old skilled, p. 264, no longer means segregatus, as in 1440, but callidus, as in our time. An official takes depositions, p. 253; I am beholding to is written instead of beholden to, p. 237. Cranmer, when ambassador in Germany, talks of the boors (peasants), reviving Lydgate's borrowed phrase. Among the Romance words are gratuity (favour, a word that comes often), monstral (monstrance), preclude, relinquish, encomy (praise), the Plural vicars chorals, prosecute an enterprise.

In Todd's 'Life,' p. 171, Cranmer gives the first hint of the change taking place in the word curate, about 1537; it may here mean an assistant appointed to the cure, not merely a parish priest. In p. 204 Cranmer talks of a suspicious letter; that is, containing ground for suspicion.

In Latimer's 'Remains' (Parker Society) of this time, we see how common was the phrase New Learning, p. 318, applied to Protestantism, not to the ideas of Erasmus. There is mine outward man (corpus), p. 331; and the old spinner (aranea). Latimer speaks of a small bull of the Pope's he has found as a bullock. He first, I think, used the term mother-wits, p. 338, meaning the knowledge we have from Mother Nature. He talks of the small of his back, p. 386. He uses the phrases take chalk for cheese, lay a train and trap before me, p. 324, lose my patience; the verb clog stands in p. 372, which perhaps comes from the idea of being daubed with clay. A man is too cocket with his promotion, p. 380; this is a halfway step between the verb cokerin (fovere) of 1440 and our cocky. Latimer says that Henry VIII., on being asked as to certain benefices being conferred on certain priests, answered no more than give 'em, give 'em, p. 376. The preacher is fond of the form alonely; a certain divine is (stands) alone in handling Scripture, p. 389. Barclay's new phrase, what a man! now leads to what a great fool am I! p. 385. Among the Romance words we see "have your quietus est" (quittance or pardon), p. 309, inhibit a preacher, in very deed, remiss, fiction (deceit). What we call a tour was in Latimer's day a progress; a very obscure man may go a progress, p. 365.

Some of the triumphal shows in Henry the Eighth's time may be seen described in Arber's 'English Garner,' vol. ii. The old poesy is made posy in p. 49; it here refers to rimes, not to flowers, a much later sense. The old fane (vexillum) changes its first letter and becomes vane (on a turret), p. 49. We find gunshot, cupbearer. The sundry still bears its old sense of separatus in p. 58. There is Switzer, p. 37, very different from Tyndale's form Souchenar.

In Halliwell's 'Letters of the English Kings' of this time, Henry VIII. talks of a man keeping a woman, an evident importation from France, p. 316; he puts pen to a book, p. 355. Among his Romance phrases are incestuous, vote it to us, crown Imperial (of England), ladies of honour (rank), others of your sort, in such sort that, silence them, justness.

A Yorkshireman, Sir Francis Bygod, who was soon to die a traitor's death, wrote a small book against impropriations in 1535; in this he, like a true subject of the burly Tudor, reviles the Pope, attacks monastic abuses, and is loud in praise of the Mass. He declares that his doctrine is no neue lernynge ; the Gospel must go forward in his right trade ; this word still bears its Northern sense of cursus, as in Wyntoun. Bygod has "your fathers were wyse, both tagge and rag ;" that is, one and all. Abbey loutes or lubbers were to become proverbial ; the former noun is new. Monks have sure stakes to stand with ; the verb stake had already been used by Palsgrave. Among the verbs we see put out of the waye, stand at your negative, come short home of it ; here we drop the noun. We see vycarage, parson's mancion (the Scotch manse), to object. There is a pun on monster and monastery ; Bygod addresses my maisters impropriated or improper maisters, and talks of a Sir John Lackelatin. He tells us of a common phrase in his day, "such a prioress is parson here."

A few things to be remarked may be found in the documents of this time in the 'History of the Earls of Kildare.' We see the name O'Brien written O Brene, showing that the ie must have once been sounded like French é, p. 179. Gerald Fitzgerald might be written Garret Fiz Garret, p. 200. What was called a moustache forty years later appears here as an upper berde, p. 98. A person is spoken of as a rebel's right hand, p. 196 ; we should now add man. There is the phrase, in p. 193, kepe him so under, that, etc. We hear of the Provust Marshall, p. 156. One sign of Latin influence is that traitor is written traditour, p. 146. We have a curious list (p. 327) drawn up in 1526 of the books possessed by the Earl of Kildare ; these are Latin, French, English, and Irish.

Some pieces in 'Dodsley's Plays' (Hazlitt's Edition) belong to this time ; see pp. 70 and 401. Here is the contraction wertnot for were it not, p. 75 ; this kind of shortening was to go on throughout the Century. The þ (it is most unusual) replaces d ; for we find thumper from the old dump, just as faith replaced the French feid. There are the new substantives a wanton, a loser. Thersites says that he is sick of his mother, a new phrase. There is they give me the wall, p. 401, the battle shall be pight, p. 404, the first hint of a pitched battle. In p. 423 stands it is too too, the pastime ; a phrase revived in our day. We have the new Adverb amain, and the Interjection ho, ho! the howe, howe, of 1400. There is sillabub, from the Scandinavian swell bouk (swell-belly). Among the Romance phrases are bery of maidens, a word no longer applied to animals; this is a sure card, this piece of work, p. 363; the word slave is revived in England, after a long sleep.

In 1538 Bale wrote a tragedy, in seven acts, called 'God's Promises;' it may be found in Marriott's 'Miracle Plays,' p. 223. There are the old forms up so downe and trone, not throne, p. 246. We see stycke unto a thing. There are wynde pypes and humayne, our human, p. 245.

In Collier's 'Dramatic Poetry,' vol. ii., there is a piece written about 1540; here we see kokscome, which was worn by a fool, p. 258; there is the verb twydle, which seems to be connected with twirl.

In the 'Letters on the Suppression of the Monasteries' (Camden Society) are many that range between 1537 and 1540. There is the old form Glowsetur, p. 196, and our new Gloscetur, p. 193. Another town appears as Leycettour. An Abbess contracts halfpenny worth into halporth, p. 231. A famous Herefordshire house appears as both Skidmore and Scudamore. Among the Substantives is hege row; the word mynch (monacha) is still used in the South, p. 228, as in Layamon's time. The new phrase, the halff blodd, appears in p. 286. The words day and law seem to have been used without distinction about this time; a man is given three years' day to do something, p. 277. The word pretty is used ironically in p. 198; some monkish crimes are called praty besynes. Chancellor Audley talks of good and goodly air. There are the new phrases find the menys to, etc., p. 205, mak his hand (make a purse for himself), p. 234. A man draws up a calculation so ner as I can knowe, p. 210; hence was to come "a near guess." The Romance words are implementes (furniture), transpose (translate a see), renterowle, trynket, burglary, sayntly, incongrue (unfit), the rates, inveigle, haut treason. The old gilofre appears as gelofer flower, p. 172. The phrase the relygyon is employed for monk's profession, almost for the last time, in p. 197. The word improve is used in our sense, p. 257.

The phrase streyn himself is applied to Edward VI. not long after his birth, p. 246. The word comyt (committee) appears in p. 239.

In Tunstall's famous sermon on the Supremacy in 1539, the preacher shows his Northern origin by the form chyllder (pueri). We see the new form ye, ye, not yea, yea; this paved the way for the spread of the form aye (yes);¹ there is also race (cursus), altered from the old raes; this word here used in its modern sense seems due to the North. There are the forms the most hardest of all, from one place to another moche lyke (the first place). We see the new phrase have nought to saye for hym selfe. The old English Negative, rejected by Tyndale, is continued; no miserie never was, nor none can be. Men swear at everye worde, a new use of the at. The French words are problem, superioritie, compounder of strife. Tunstall divides the Ten Commandments in the Protestant, not in the Roman fashion, which is curious. Tyndale's repent, you is also preferred to the old do penance. The well-known future Cardinal appears as Raynolde Pole.

Nicholas Udall in 1542 translated the 'Apophtegms of Erasmus'; I have used the reprint by Mr. Roberts in 1877. Our author abounds in Northern phrases and forms; many of his new words appear afterwards in Foxe. He is fond of ea, as feacte and to tract; the old pietee (pity) is still retained. The e is suppressed, as battree, battring. The oy replaces o, as joyly (hilaris), p. 153; this must have been an attempt at deriving jolly from joy. The French is imitated when ue is needlessly added to a word, as doggue, pangué; of this our tongue is a survival; there is also publique; eguell (equal) is a compromise between Latin and French. The t becomes th, as aucthour for auctor. The h is inserted, from a false analogy, in livelehood (opes), p. 358; we saw livelyhed in 1470 standing for the old liflode. The b is struck out; Skelton's gambon becomes gammounde, p. 100. The r is struck out; the old torple becomes topple, p. 165; the r is added, as windor (fenestra), p. 134. The n

Among the new Substantives are livelinesse, mongrel, cates, haver (possessor), blockehed, slepiness, sugar lofe, handy gripes (handgrips, p. 209), day time, ynkehorne termes (fine language), a hanging matter, fore fynger, beggerliness, hob-goblin, harier, buckhound, brewage, Swyerlande, p. 307. There are phrases like a foul shame, not a rag to hang about him, be at thine elbow, man of fewe wordes, the botome of his harte, a peck of troubles. The word witte in p. xxiii. stands for something that provokes laughter; Heywood had already shown the new meaning taken by the term. The word toy had already meant a trifle or a folly; it now stands for a play on words, p. 115; and in p. xxiv. it expresses joke. The word weight is used morally as well as physically; a good speaker gives weighte to his sayings, p. xix. The word sleight, lowered in meaning, is used of a juggler's tricks, p. 31; we are not far from sleight of hand. The word way stands for knack or trick; in p. 185 a man has the waie to take profit of his enemies; in p. 225 grooms have not the waies to handle a horse. The best of the dice, in casting, was called the cock, p. 186; hence "cock of the school." Dunbar's odds are much developed here; too far odds (too great inequality) is a favourite phrase; oddes is used as a synonym for difference in p. 282, as in our "what's the odds?" The word shift implies "power of usefulness" in p. 119; a woman is of small shift, whence came the later shiftless. The word home is used in a new sense; "pay home a debt," p. 120, "pay a man home a jest," p. 245; hence the later strike home. The word match means simply a comparison that may be made, p. 252; in p. 370 a match means "a brace of equals." The verb reach gives birth to a substantive bearing the same meaning; we see above our reach, p. 11. We have seen at the next doore by in 1500; we now have, in p. 41, be nexte doore by a thing, or nexte cousin to a thing; we now say, "next door to." There are new diminutives; Udall has not only hillock, but rottocke, a little rod, p. 174; the Northern bittock is well known. The Greek paidion is Englished by another diminutive, sonnekin, p. 233. Scott makes the English clowns threaten Madge Wildfire with a whisterpoop; here in p. 112 we light upon whistersnefet (ictus). The word goodman had become so common that it was used in addressing a person, like master or Sir; as goodman cock! p. 124. We see cockescomb used for a fool, p. 118. There is Collepixie (fairy), p. 125; the last half of the word is still used in Devonshire. The noun renneway appears in p. 135, formed probably on the model of runagate. Udall is fond of phrases like a dog's life, dog weary (dog tired), dog hole. He uses girl for meretrix in p. 154; the word made its way very slowly in the South. We talk of a fool's cap; Udall of a fooles hood, p. 250. There is an imitation of sound in play toodle loodle, referring to a bagpipe, p. 250. The substantive goodlinesse (very different from goodness) is now formed from the adjective, p. 254. The ship is often added to nouns to express an office, as constableshyp, consulshyp. Cæsar, when staking all, resolves to be man or mouse (make or mar), p. 298. The old merle, still used in poetry, makes way for blackbyrd, p. 318. Verres is said to play sweepstake, p. 359 (swept off all); we apply the word to a thing, not to a man. Rocks may be of a steep down fall, p. 151; the word was to take our sense a few years later. The word Germans begins to supplant Almains or Dutchmen.

Among the Adjectives are ferthermost, p. 127, squinteyed, bokish, far seeing, snappish. The word dry is applied to witty jokes, p. x.; a man rained on has never a drie thred about him, p. 111. The sely continues to express stultus; it is applied to a man of no wit, a sheep's head, p. 122; what we call "a poor creature" is in p. 126 a sely creature. The shrewd now takes a new sense; it was a shrewd likelihood, p. 168; hence our shrewd guess; here the adjective rises from malus to acutus, something higher, an unusual process in English. The sound is connected with sleep, stepe soundely, p. 234. Orrmin's chary (mæstus) now takes the sense of parcus, p. 248, as we still use it. The word fine now means clever, pp. 326 and 371. The affix some is used in compounding, as troublesome; also the ish, as brutish; also the like, as fellowlike, giantlike. We see flat as a cake, p. 250; we substitute pancake. There are the phrases come home as wise as he went, p. 20, be a dedde man, p. 43, as much as his life is woorth, p. 87, in open court. There is a curious instance of the substantive being dropped after the adjective in give as good as he brought, p. 139, give hym as good againe, p. 19. The word cheap is rapidly becoming an adjective, it is cheape inough, p. 19. The old on lif (alive) now gives birth to a new adjective, a live dog, p. 286. The snattid of 1440 now gives birth to snatnosed, p. 250; Mr. Snatt was one of the divines who, in the next Century, absolved Fenwick on the scaffold.

As to the Pronouns, the Dative me is used most freely here, as also in Ascham; he chopped me it in sonder, p. 258, he flounced (ruit) me into the flood, p. 207; here the me refers to the narrator. Udall is fond of using his to express the Genitive, as Plato his pillows, p. 82. The a is used for an (one), as drink all at a draught, p. 33. The one (aliquis) is freely used; make one have an appetite, p. 131; the Genitive of this appears, come to ones handes, p. 223. There is a new phrase for nescio quid in p. 151; some great thing, whatsoever it was. There is the pleonasm, the verie self same, p. 38. The all is added to round off a sentence, the best of them all, p. 29. There is the phrase I have half a guess (I rather think), p. 123. We see a new synonym for multum, better by a great waie, p. 149. There is the new phrase be myne owne maister, p. 322; this had been earlier man, not master. The Numeral is used much like a noun, a sixe at dice, p. 186; we talk now of fivers and tenners, making the Numeral an unmistakable noun.

Among the Verbs are to gossip, to twang, flag, streighten, ear up (plough up), unfleshed. There are the phrases keep foote with (keep up with), p. 8, much good do it him! stand (consist) with reason, set spurs to, swing in a halter, take his heels, take him to his heels, picked men, make his dinner, ring in his ears, like a drowned rat, fight the field (battle), put him to a galop, stand for office, beat it into him, make the most of, make the best of, hope the best, call a counsil, take a walk, have a fling at him, stricken in love. The verb be, as we saw before, had acquired the sense of go; it is followed by the Infinitive, he had been to see it, p. 151. There is a change in drown in p. 65; Ægina drowned the beauty of Athens; Udall notes this as a peculiar English phrase; we now say that one colour kills another. The verb bait (laccessere) had been applied to animals; it is now used of men, p. 120, reviled by their enemies. The word cut now means ire as well as secare; ships cut between Scylla and Charybdis, p. 133; the verb, used in this sense (cut along) is still reckoned slang after 340 years, though we may write a short cut. The verb make gets the sense of vadere; he made upon them, p. 295; Patten uses this a few years later. The verb take is used much in the same way; take after the Prince, p. 296, se gerere. The verb wed is not confined to marriage; wedded to his faction, p. 311. A man is done with age, p. 364; this reminds us of Virgil's macie confecta. The Past Participle wont (solitus) had long been known; we now see wonted, which is used as an adjective, p. 33. We cry, go it, to boys when fighting; Udall uses go to on a similar occasion, p. 27. A man is made blank (discomfited), p. 67; we say, look blank. Udall has in p. 87 "whoso hath stepped forth and sette in foote to take," etc.; hence comes our rather different set on foot a plan; the sette in in the first sentence seems to mean proferre. A man setles him selfe to dwell, p. 130; hence our settler. The old adjective rakel (promptus), from a mistaken analogy, gives birth to the phrase to rake hell, p. 130. There is the Shakesperian go hang thyself, p. 145. In p. 192 a person stands to be sold; hence our stand to win. A man is worthy thirty kings set together, p. 269; we now substitute put for set. The verb trade had become so common within the last few years that we see untraded (unpractised), p. 194. In p. 230 stands she may do much with him; here the verb seems to mean valere (dugan) rather than facere. There is go so far that, etc., p. 259; we should substitute as to for that. Cæsar, blushing, shows a red pair of cheeks, p. 278; hence show a clean pair of heels. The torture of the brakes seems to be hinted at in the verb enbrake (hamper), p. 286. The people are not hushed but whished, p. 381; the Northern whist! had influence here. There is the Participle hungresterved, p. 319; in time the hunger was here to be dropped. In p. 336 one orator takes up (interrupts) another; hence in class a clever boy takes up a dull boy. In p. 354 men bear off (ward off) a blow with a buckler; hence our carry off an awkward situation. There is a new idiom in p. 373, he escaped being delivered into his hands; here a from should be the third word.

Udall likes to form Adverbs by adding ly to a Present Participle, as quippingly, nippingly; gentlemanlike and lesurly are also used as Adverbs, though soldiarlike, p. 53, is an Adjective. In p. xxiii. stands ever now and then; we now make the first word every. There are the new as though, not so moche as (not even), turn the tale in and out (inside out), p. 263. We see a new use of ever in p. 108; a mad rekening as ever I heard. There are new phrases for omnino; every inche of him, p. 213; a city is destroyed, bothe sticke and stone, p. 215.

Among the Prepositions we see out of all comparison, put him in trust with matters, out of pacience. The through is made the last word; whole nightes through, p. 367. The for had followed an adjective and thus introduced the Infinitive; it now need not follow an adjective; for us to be offended appeareth like, etc., p. v.; formerly this would have been that we shoud be offended, etc.

We see ka ka! p. 342, the noise of the crow; and foh, Skelton's fo! is an expression of disgust, in p. 356.

We have here the Scandinavian log, flash, skragge (a lean fellow), p. 301, to flounce, to scud.

The Dutch minneken gave rise to minx, p. 143, here used of a lady's lapdog.

Among the Romance words are to pouter, poinaunt (poignant), a president (precedent), induction (in reasoning), recorders (instruments), storehous, indewment (endowment), practike (practical), coungre (conger eel), grand, cross-bars, collision, position (assertion), to border on, tropic, gudgeon, urbanitie, stratagem, to license to him, forceably, the collections of Plutarch, annals, to cloy. There are the phrases in open face of the world, with what face, vein of merrynes, to soche pass, use his discretion, piece of plate, good stuff (of a book), out of conceipt with, truss up (string up, hang), mere chance, piece of werke (a great labour), propound riddles, pay down, for this present (time), natural philosopher, the veraiest foole, properly called. Some French phrases appear; as O Moun sire Capitain! sus! pot of wine (bribe), p. 195, graund seigniors (lords); gourmanders appears in p. 86, where we now clip the Teutonic ending. The Latin phrases are zona torrida, florent (flourishing), a modicum; vice versa appears as arsie versee, and this phrase may still be heard at Almondsbury in Yorkshire. Udall is fond of Latin forms like feact, traictise, conceipt, and such like. Greek words often appear here in their own character; this is one of the first fruits of the Reformation; we, of course, see apophthegm. He carefully defines metropolis as an Archbishop's see, p. 131. He brings in idees (ideas), referring to Plato's well-known theory about them, p. 138. Before this time beauty had taken the sense of decus; grace now does the same in p. xxi. The French poupée (baby, doll) is here used of young dogs. The verb train now gets the sense of educare, p. xxvi. The word point is now applied to a joke, p. 151; it means a counter in a game at dice, p. 186. The new adjective neat is coupled with clean in p. 62; in p. 32 it means daintily dressed; it afterwards ran side by side with nice. The adjective pleasant is here constantly used for sayings that are witty. The word miser, meaning wretch, appears in p. 76; twenty years later it was to take its present meaning. The word valour still keeps its old meaning of worth. The word justly means exactly, p. 133; in p. 159 the sun lies just over a place, a Northern phrase. In p. 133 a Christian body means a human form; it is applied to the monster Scylla; hence we often call men Christians. The Roman prænomen is called Christian name in English, p. 339. The adjective base gets a new shade of meaning in p. 155; a bastard is basse born. A full explanation is given of cophin, p. 159, as the receptacle of the carcasses of noble persons. The word civilitee stands for mildness or humanity in p. 185, also for courtesy, p. 254. Danae is set afloat in a trounke of wood, p. 189; hence our trunk. The word vile is used of a very abject nation, p. 208. The word duty means proper reverential attitude; do her dutie unto Alexander, p. 232. A bombastic orator rolls (exults) in painted terms, p. 243; hence our "roll in wealth," and the later rollick. The word bountie (goodness) is now used as a synonym for generosity in giving, p. 241,* as in Elyot; there is also bountifulnesse. We see party constantly employed for homo; in p. 325 stands please all parties. Athens is called in p. 246 the only poste to lean to; the old sense of pillar was here soon to make way for that of stronghold. In p. 255 briber still keeps its sense of latro. In p. 269 memory takes the new meaning of "power of recollecting." In the same page we hear of letters directorie or letters of addresse; that is, they contained both the name of the receiver and the message conveyed; we now make directory a substantive. Men give their devocion (contribution) towards a religious object in p. 325; hence our "devote money to." A lady is called a riche marriage, p. 355; we should here substitute good match. In p. 371 affectation of eloquence is used for study of eloquence; affectation, as we now use it, implies something studied and not natural. The phrase allude to (refer to) is often used; it had already appeared in More. Tales are made double dedde by evil handling, p. xxi.; that is, they fall flat; hence our "dead failure." A Romance substantive is turned into an adjective by simply adding ed; merie conceived, p. xxvi. In p. 339 Cicero never did on harness (bore arms), for the matter (his defeat of Catiline); hence our common for the matter of that. Palsgrave had used provision of meat; Udall makes provision a synonym for vitailles, p. 94. In p. 27 Socrates is advised to use his tenne commaundementes (ten fingers) in a brawl. The verb counter, still used in the prize ring, is applied to combatants in p. 46. A man does a feat trickely, p. 121; hence the later adjective tricksy. There is the Shakesperian chartered or privileged, p. 285. In p. 113 we hear of a fellow of the Goddes abandoned, our "abandoned wretch;" the Scotch say of a man acting foolishly, "he was so left to himself that," etc. The noun pelvir (spolium) now gives birth to the verb to pielf (pilfer), p. 117. We see body politike in p. 172 ; one of the few instances in which we still put the adjective after the substantive. The word blank is made a substantive, p. 186, and is applied to dice. A soldier bills himself among the sick, p. 214 ; in our day an actor wishes to be well billed. The word square is now made a substantive ; out of square (the old frame), p. 347 ; hence "act on the square."

Udall uses the Northern words brethred (a brotherhood), sprite, oulet, chary, to wish (hush), bonny ; there is race, in Tunstall's new sense ; there is Orrmin's trig, also trim as a trencher, p. 276 ; gay is often used for fine, as a gaie example, p. 205, gaily well broken, very Northern phrases. There are the proverbs, the more hast the wurst spede ; a thing well begon is more than halfe doen ; both in p. 41. In p. 372 stands the famous saw—

"That same man, that renneth awaie, Maie again fight, another daie."

In p. 193 a man makes his friends believe the moon to be made of a green cheese. In p. 118 is the English phrase, as wise as a gooce. It is possible to set the cart before the horses, p. 359. Our saw about a grandmother and eggs was of old, teach our dame to spinne, p. 380. A man would have an oar in each man's boat, p. 203 ; our "finger in the pie." We talk of the wrong end of the stick ; in p. 340 men have the worse end of the staff in a quarrel. The Greek parrhesiastes is Englished by Thom trowth, p. 202 ; this phrase is often met with in Udall's Century.

He wrote his play of 'Ralph Roister Doister' (see Arber's Reprint) about 1550 ; it was probably meant to be acted by his Eton boys ; the first play that deals with English everyday life, standing halfway between the Interludes of 1500 and the Comedies of 1590. Some of Udall's peculiar phrases recur in this piece. The u replaces e, as the verb justle (jostle) for the earlier gestle, p. 48. The Latin suere is expressed by both sow, p. 19, and by sew, p. 22. The old metal, when applied to the dispositions of mankind, becomes mettle, p. 34. Caxton's ghest becomes gwest, p. 11, something like our spelling now; Bishop Guest's name, about ten years later, was spelt most variably. The r is struck out; we see Margerie, Mage, and Madge, all for one person, pp. 19 and 20. Your mastership becomes your maship, p. 16, like the later your La'ship. Among the new Substantives stand Hoddydodie, p. 11, harebraine, drudgerie, a wag, my sweete heart, loutishnesse, potgunne, p. 73; hence we take pot shots; a later variation is popgun. A man is hailed as my heart of gold, p. 25. A girl ramps abroad like a Tom boy, p. 37. A message comes by worde of mouth, p. 40. There is the curious form knightess, p. 78. Among the Adjectives stand in the hotte haste, p. 12; a lady of property is worth a thousand pound, p. 16. A mistress, when sternly reproving a servant, addresses her as pretie mayde, p. 37. There is a play upon musical terms in p. 44, "Hast thou a flat answer?" then follows, "Nay, a sharp answer." A man puts his friend into a genteel attitude, and then says, "So, that is somewhat like" (our something like); I suppose the proper thing is dropped after like. In p. 20 stands sit downe like a good girle. The you, which had long been encroaching on the ye, is now found as a Vocative; you great calfe! p. 37.

Among the Verbs are runne mad, renne on patins (said of the tongue), keepe within doores, play the man. A verb is struck out in best open it, p. 31. Something of the same kind may be remarked in p. 42, ye a woman, and your letter unredde? There is a new sense of make in what maketh he here? p. 23, which seems to come from the French. The verb have gets a new meaning, accipere; no woman will have him (for husband), p. 44. The word no stands by itself as an exclamation of surprise, p. 38. A man is farre in with a new love, p. 33; here we should put on for the in; it may stand for far in love with. We see up to the harde cares in love, p. 12. There is to it again! p. 78, with no verb; we find also the stern command in at doores, p. 40, with no verb. In the phrase yes, for twentie pounde, p. 47, the assurance "I will warrant it" is dropped; our betting sentences were to be very terse.

Among the Interjections are kocksnownes! law! p. 28, heigh how! (a sigh), hoigh dagh (hey day), whough! thrumpledum thrum (of a gittern), dubbe a dubbe (of a drum). The phrase chip chow, cherry chow, may be heard in English choruses in our day; we see in p. 36—

“ With chip and cherie,
Heigh derie derie.”

The last word was often to reappear.

Among the Romance words are foolyng, paragon, brute (applied to a man), insurance (engagement, p. 70), plaine (sheer) force, procedyngs. The word humour is now applied to the mind, as well as to the body; the roysting sort feed the humour of the vainglorious, p. 10. The adjective brave is connected with clothes, and means fine, p. 35; this had appeared in Dunbar. A girl ramps like a Tom boy, p. 37; we make it romp. The verb promise means here desponsare; a lady says, I am promised, p. 42. The word courtesy is now made a verb, p. 26; men are ordered to curtsie. There is the phrase plie my business, p. 30. A forward fellow is addressed as Sir sauce, p. 48. There are puns on the word stomach in p. 71; the master uses it to express his courage; the man uses it to jeer at his master's appetite. The hero of the play gets his name Roister Doister from the French rustre; we hear of the roysting sort in p. 10; our verb royster was to follow later. We see the stage Latin exceant omnes, Actus, Scena, etc.; in our days the stage borrows more from French than from Latin. One of the stage characters, Merrygreek, shows the origin of our grig.

When an ignorant man or woman is brought on the stage in this Century, the Somersetshire dialect is usually put into his mouth; this lasted for the next fifty years, down to Shakespere's Edgar. In p. 23 Margery Mumblecrust employs God yelde you, chad, ichotte, chwas; here the ch expresses ich (I); further on comes zembletee (semblance). A more Northern phrase appears in I mun be married, p. 87

Some very old forms are found in this play; as God you save and see! busk (bush), me lust (placet mihi), no force (no matter). The soldier's cry, Saint George to borow! p. 74, long preserved in the South the sense of surety, which came into the last word; the Scotch courts still talk of law borows. The Infinitive in ing reappears once more, I think for the last time, in p. 39; he hath somewhat to doeing (facere); this rimes with the Participle woeing.

Andrew Boorde was a traveller and physician, who wrote some books in 1542 or thereabouts (Early English Text Society, Extra Series). He is very fond of new words formed from the Latin, and is thus a forerunner of the Euphuists. His opinion of his own tongue is this: "The speche of Englande is a base speche to other noble speches, as Italion, Castylian, and Frenche; howbeit the speche of Englande of late dayes is amended," p. 122. The style of More, Tyndale, and Coverdale must have seemed poor stuff indeed to our travelled physician's eyes. He leans, however, to old fashions in the matter of the Double Negative. He gives us two well-known saws, "the white (gray) mare is the better horse," p. 68, and "when the drynke is in, the wytte is out," p. 94. The Italians, he affirms, used to say of England, bona terra, mala gent, p. 118; a future Shakesperian saw applied to Kent. Borde was the second writer who gave specimens of the peculiarities of our English dialects; he treats of the Cornish, with their Tre, Poll, Pen, the iche cham (ego sum), dycke (thick), and the old afyngred (anhungred), p. 122; he gives us the Lowland Scotch gawd, blewd (good, blood), ken ye (Englished by do you know?), I es (ego sum), p. 138. The Irish sor (sir) is marked in p. 134. All things change; in p. 194 Borde says that in Toulouse regneth treue iustyce & equitie; this was not the experience of the Calas family two Centuries later. The Germans had not yet lost the sounds of their old w and ei, for wayne is their word for vinum, p. 161. The Italians said kela and kesta, not quella and questa, just as their qui had long become chi, p. 179.

As to Vowels, i continues to express something like the French é, for Bayonne is written Bion several times. Borde makes a distinction between Scotch lordes and lardes (lairds) in p. 59. The French seem at this time to have pronounced the old Pictavia as Puttyors, p. 191; this oi, once sounded like ê, had now got the ou sound; and the ie in the last syllable was no longer sounded like ê, but each vowel must have been pronounced. As to the Consonants, the m is exchanged for n; the old pinpel appears as pymple.

Among the Substantives we see redshank (applied to the Irish), the Scotch placke, instep, hay ricke, chilblain. In p. 235 air is said to be fryske (a Scandinavian form), not fresh; in p. 117 a change-loving man is called a frysker, whence comes frisky. In p. 124 rekenyng is used of the money due to mine host. Provisions are called good cheere. Borde talks of dwelling at elbowe-rome, p. 233; he writes of a man's doublet and a woman's waste cote (waistcoat), p. 97. The Five Wittes are mentioned in p. 93, though sences is given here as a synonym. We hear of the keper of a lunatic, p. 298. Beer in p. 256 is said to have lately come to England. We read of the Nether lond, p. 155, which is here said to extend to Mayence; it is otherwise called Base Almayne.

Among the Adjectives is lyght-fyngered. We hear of naughty (bad) English, of clowtyd crayme; there is the phrase rest in a hole skin, p. 169.

Borde is fond of you as the Nominative; in p. 138 he contrasts this new fashion with the Scotch ye. In p. 219, when advice is given to a possible traveller setting out, it is said he must do so and so; this he is suddenly turned into you; "you must make your bargain;" our use of this you is very common.

As to Verbs, there are the phrases set cocke on the hoope, p. 117, keep touch, cutte down (from the gibbet), p. 206. The verb grow takes an Accusative, as grow grapes. A traveller makes his banke with some merchant, p. 219.

Among the Romance words are modern, musherom. In p. 226 Borde talks of your recuperatyng or recovering your health; all through this Century the Latin was coming in by the side of the French synonyms, hitherto employed in England. The French pastenaque had already given birth to Palsgrave's pasneppe and Elyot's parsneppe; this is here written persnep.¹ We read of base gold, p. 153; the word was changing from inferior to turpis. The usual title of physicians is seen in p. 226, mayster doctor Buttes; there is also Doctor Boorde, p. 143. We read of aqua vite, an Irish drink. In p. 214 we light upon the Sophy of Persia.

There is the Scandinavian roudge (rug). We find here the Celtic pilchard and the verb quaf, said to come from the Celtic cuach (poculum); Palsgrave had already written quaught in the Perfect.

There is an account of Lord Hertford's raid into Scotland in 1544 (Arber's 'Garland,' i. 115). Here the Yorkshire nout (boves) appear as note, the Scotch nolt, p. 126. Among the verbs are give an alarm and the weather broke up. There is the Danish word fog (mist), p. 122. Hertford himself is called the Lord Lieutenant; cannon are dismounted; two verbs that come most appropriately into this piece are sack and ruinate.

Roger Ascham, born in North Yorkshire, was one of the early Protestants who were bred at Cambridge. He wrote his famous work 'Toxophilus' (I have used Arber's Reprint) in the year 1544. Says the sound patriot, "I have written this Englishe matter in the Englishe tongue, for Englishe men." He resolves to speak as the common people do, to think as wise men do; also to keep clear of strange Latin, French, and Italian words. Ascham's Northern birth is attested by the words combersome, stoure (pugna), ilnesse (pravitas), laste (permanence) freke (vir), ware (collocare), braye (collis); the Northern flee, not the Southern fly, expresses volare; Page's turnpike is repeated, p. 88. As to his Vowels and Consonants, a bow-maker appears as bower in p. 110, and as bowyer in p. 114. The old w makes way for b; the verb wedde becomes bet (so Will becomes Bill); to laye and bet with a man is in p. 19.² The l and r interchange; we hear of the citie of Argier, p. 82.

Among the new Substantives are inkeper, Turkishnesse (barbarism), cutte (vulnus), bent (inclination of a bow), head of ale, a lowse (impulse), a wether man (weather wise). In p. 48 auctumnus is called faule of the leafe; this has been passed on from Yorkshire to America. Men are called true hertes, p. 78. There is the phrase both man and boye (omnes), p. 100; we use it in a rather different sense. Certain arrow heads are called by merry fellows bobtayles, p. 126; others are called swalowe tayles, p. 135. The noun wrentche, in p. 49, ceases to express dolus, and takes our sense of the word. The old match gets the new meaning of certamen, and is applied to archery, p. 91. There is the new phrase in good sadnesse (earnest), p. 102. In p. 56 oaths are heaped upon oaths, one in anothers necke; a new phrase. In p. 98 a man asks to be taught archery by a trade or waye, so as to succeed; the derivation of trade from tread is very plain here. Dr. Murray gives bencher and barrester as words of this date.

Among the new Adjectives are dankish, bygge brested, sadle backed (called a shooter's word, p. 129), hie rigged, unhansum, workable. An old Adjective of Orrmin's is revived in tricke and trimme, p. 28. There is the phrase weake as water, p. 28. The adjective prety is applied to good poetry, p. 52. The noughly (malus) is in constant use. The word rank gets the new sense of copious, p. 93. In p. 128 fenny is opposed to uplandish; the latter word here seems to change its old sense, and to mean hilly. The word plompe, meaning rotundus, is applied to the head of an arrow, p. 137. There is dompysse, p. 28, used of the mind; we apply dumpy to the body.

The Nominative ye replaces you in p. 54, to set ye one (unum tibi dare). There is the phrase the onelye causes, p. 89; here only is coupled with a Plural. The old Northern whatkin war becomes, in p. 69, what kynde of war; Ascham brought this North Western idiom to the South; he has also al kyndes of, for the old al kin.

Among the Verbs are know where to have him, cocker him up, owe ill wyll to, put to nurse, bear your halfe, p. 55 (go halves with you), come in their walke (way), work him woe, cut short, let drive at him, you will have it so, shoot straight, fit your bow, string it, it will gyve (fail), make poste haste, take ame. There is the new verb crust; snow is crusted after a frost, p. 157. Udall's corruption to rake hell is repeated in p. 33. Men play with laws; that is, trifle with them, p. 97. Another verb for this is derived from pedler's wares; men piddel about their bows, p. 117. A book may runne away with a man, p. 25; a new metaphor. A man's finger hurteth, p. 109; here the verb becomes intransitive. There is the Passive phrase, it was heard tell on, p. 100. I have heard it disputed whether oarsmen should say, backwatering or backing water; Ascham has, in p. 89, marking at one, yet let driving at another (not letting drive). He is sure that the Turk shulde not onelye not overcome us, but, etc.; a most awkward turn of phrase, p. 81. There is a new Superlative Adverb, to rise erliest, p. 27. In p. 101 a man shoots wyde and far of the marke; this is one of the few instances, where we now prefer the old of to the later off. We see down the wind, and for al time. There is the phrase shoot under hand, p. 126. Things stand by contraries, p. 45. There is the Old English one amonges twenty, p. 48; not our later "one in twenty," which is more like the Gothic.

There is the Dutch verb foist, which is used much as the new Celtic verb cog, for cheating; see both in p. 54. There is moreover the Celtic creased (wrinkled), p. 138.

Among the Romance words are minikin, galiard (a dance), paragraph, enemyes by nature, aptness, well seasoned (of wood), soft spirited, bow case, brasell (the wood), to peece a shaft, to course (run) over, pliable, to vault, enjoy a woman. Ascham coins the phrase scholar or unscholar, p. 38. He speaks of God and his high providence, p. 81; the last word was now coming into fashion. Palsgrave's antique appears in p. 147; in p. 47 it takes the form of anticke; to daunce anticke; we perform antics; the idea must be something out of modern fashion, and therefore uncouth; in Foxe, twenty years later, the word means trick. Ascham says that "artillarie now a dayes is taken for two thinges; gunnes and bowes," p. 65; Jonathan's artillery in the Bible is well known to us. In p. 67 the morispike is coupled with spear; pike, the soldier's weapon, was soon to appear. In p. 96 we learn that of fence is made an art; the noun fence (defence), taking a new meaning, is here opposed to shooting. We hear of virgin wax, p. 109; a new sense of the word. In p. 111 the verb save is connected with money. A side wind tryeth an archer much, p. 156; here the try slips into the sense of incommodum ferre; it is rather different from Tyndale's sense, that of severely testing. There is the new phrase be in companye with, p. 86. The old in taper wise becomes taper fashion, p. 126.

Ascham gives us the well-known Scotch byword, that every English archer beareth under his girdle twenty-four Scottes, p. 84. He alters, as he himself says, the proverb anent cooks, "God sendeth us good fethers, but the devil noughtie fletchers," p. 132. He was the first, I think, to bring Thucydides to English notice, for he tells the well-known tale of the arrow at Sphacteria, p. 75. He asserts that Wales was in old time given up to barbarism (More enlarges on the Welsh thieves of his day); "but now, thanked be God and noble Englande, there is no country more civil," p. 85. Scotland, it is hinted, had better imitate Wales and unite with England. The Cantab refers to the proverbial barrenness of Newmarket Heath, p. 97. He describes how he was brought up, with many other children, in the house of Sir Humfrey Wingfelde, who would bring bows and arrows down from London, and see his young friends shoot; the knight coupled the book and the bow, as the foundation of youth, p. 140. Chaucer is called "oure Englyshe Homer," p. 54; and his verses on dice-playing and swearing are quoted with much approval. Ascham, learned man as he was, fastened on the old Northern ballad metres to translate Homer; see the specimen in p. 66.

Heywood brought out his Proverbs in 1546; this work was printed ten times in the author's Century, and has been lately reprinted by Mr. Sharman, whose edition I follow. There is the great contraction bir Ladie! (by our Lady), p. 105. The 'Handlyng Synne' had used the phrase daunt (dandle) a child; the t now is changed into a sound like s; dance a woman on his lap, p. 170. There are the new substantives hony moone (connected with marriage), *a meale mouth*¹ (adulator), a flebergebet, a flea-biting. There is flimflam (a trifle), formed in Skelton's fashion. We hear of a band for a hat, p. 90. A wife complains that her goods are wasted on "a sort of dogs and sawte bitches," p. 158; the last word here takes the sense of meretrix, I think, for the first time; the name Gil bears the same meaning in p. 122. The word girle is opposed to boy in p. 50; the former noun was getting a new sense in this reign. The old rood (crux) was now vanishing; but it appears in the common oath, p. 108. The word coockqueane is used of a woman in p. 131; Shakespere and Addison use it of a man who busies himself in woman's affairs. Heywood employs jar in his new sense of riza, as he had done in his former works.

Among the Adjectives are fat fed, a loose or od end, a breackneck fall. A new sense is given to thick; thicke of hearing, p. 153. A picture is painted, not lifelike, but lively, p. 26. There is the bad grammar, sometimes followed by Shakespere, who have we there? p. 52. We light on the scornful a visage, such as it was, p. 88. Among the Verbs are, your nose drops, a ship draws water, ride at anker. We see the new Adverbial phrase far on, p. 164, where the way is dropped after on. We find proceed upon (this), grow upon her fansie, p. 38, where the idea must be "take rooted hold upon." Wit is in the wane, p. 140; here we now put on for in. There is the cry taunt tivet! (tantivy), addressed to a woman, p. 149; it answers to hollo!

Among the Romance phrases are a foile (trip), to anker, repine, tit for tat (tant pour tant), jeblet of a goose, to be quite of her, change places, in (at) any rate. We read of hackney men, who let out horses, p. 71; hackney coaches were to come fourscore years later. In p. 84 the receiver is connected with the thief. Palsgrave had written take herte a gresse; here in p. 149 stands she takth hart of grace; perhaps this may come from animals growing hearty on grass. The word beadrole in p. 132 drops its connexion with prayer (bede), and means simply a catalogue. In p. 151 a person decays (becomes poor); a new sense of the verb. In p. 140 we hear of a man of fancie fine and neate; both these adjectives here seem to take the new sense of fastidious; our "fine lady" and "natty dress" retain this shade of meaning.

Heywood gives us many a well-known proverb for the first time; as—

"The tide tarieth no man.

Faste binde, faste finde.

Betwene two stools my taile goes to the ground.

Wedding is destiny (our marriages are made in heaven).

He laughth that winth.

No man ought to look a given horse in the mouth.

As I would needes brewer, so must I needes drink.

Reckoners without their host must reckon twice.

Two heads are better than one (Palsgrave's wyttes).

All is well that endes well.

The still sow eats up all the draffe.

All is not gold that glisters (Chaucer's glareth).

Ill weede growth fast.

Beggars should be no choosers.

Somewhat is better than nothing.

It is evill waking of a sleeping dogge (see Chaucer, p. 116 of my book).

The rolling stone never gatherth mosse.

A man may well bring a horse to the water, but he cannot make him drink.

Better children weep than old men.

Rome was not built in one day.

A dog hath a day.

Better is the half a lofe than no bread.

Nought venter, nought have.

Ka mee, ka thee; one good turn asketh another.

Evil gotten goods never proveth well.

That shalbe, shalbe.

New brome swepth cleene.

All thing is the woorse for the wearing.

There is no foole to the old foole.

Love me little, love me long.

Thought is free.

A woman hath nine lives like a cat.

Change is no robbery.

Tread a woorme on the taylor and it must turn again.
 Too much of one thing is not good.
 Even reckoning maketh long frendes.
 Small pitchers have wyde ears.
 The weaker goeth to the pot.¹
 Might overcomth right.
 No fire without some smoke.
 One swallow maketh not summer.
 A cat may look upon a king.
 Leape out of the frying pan into the fyre.
 Ill gotten, ill spent.
 Half warnd, half armd.
 He that hath an ill name is half hanged.
 It is better to be an old man's derling than a young man's werling.
 Few words to the wise suffise to be spoken.
 I know on which side my bread is buttred.
 Sooth bourd is no bourd.²

“ ‘Who is so deafe or so blinde, as is he
 That wilfully will neither hear nor see?’

To mend as sowre ale mendeth in summer.³
 He knew which way the winde blew.
 Some man may steal a horse better than some other may stand and look upon.

Love me, love my dog.⁴
 When theeves fall out, true men come to their good.
 What is a workman without his tooles?
 When I give you an inch you take an ell.
 Will yee both eat your cake and have your cake?
 He can have no more of the foxe but the skin.⁵
 Every man for himself and God for us all.
 Enough is as good as a feast.
 An yll wynd that blowth no man good.”⁶

There are some phrases and proverbs here, afterwards repeated or glanced at by Shakespere, as—

“ Happy man, happy dole (Winter's Tale).⁷
 Litle pot soone hot (Shrew).
 It is deere collup that is cut out of th' owne flesh (Henry VI.), A.
 Where nought is to wed with, wise men flee the clog (Winter's Tale).

² Used by the Provost of Dumfries in ‘Redgauntlet.’

³ Used by Davie Gellatley in ‘Waverley.’

Moe maydes but Malkin (Coriolanus).

Kinde will creepe where it may not go (Verona).

The cat would eat flesh and would not wet her feet (Macbeth).

While the grasse groweth the horse starveth (Hamlet).

Hunger pearceth stone wall (Coriolanus).

Cold as kay (key) (Richard III.).

Three may keep counsaile if two be away (Andronicus).

To runne out of God's blessing into the warm Sunne (Lear).

Much water goeth by the mill that the miller knoweth not of (Andronicus).

A poore cooke that may not lick his own fingers (Romeo)."

There are many phrases that are still in our mouths, as—"A rod made for his own taile.

The fat is in the fire.

To beate the bush.

More frayd than hurt.

Let the world wagge and take mine ease in mine inne.

Hold their noses to grinstone.

Cut my cote after my cloth.

For good luck cast an old shoe after him.

To tell tales out of schoole.

To hold with the hare and run with the hound.

Nether fish nor flesh nor good red herring.

She had seene far in a milstone.¹

She lookth as butter will not melt in her mouth.

Have a flea in the ear.

Here is the dore, and there is the way.

To help a dogge over a stile.

The moonshine in the watter.

A hair of the dog that bit us (of drinking).

The birds were flowne (referring to men).

Her eares might well glow, for all the towne talked of her.

Hot as a toste.

Jacke out of office.

A peny for your thought!

You cannot see the wood for the trees.

You might have gone further and fared worse.

To harpe upon a string.

The gray mare is the better horse (Borde's white mare).

We twayne are one too many.

To laugh in my sleeve.

To have him on the hip.

Rub him on the gall.

Drive him to the wall.

Farther than the wall he cannt go.

It is sooner sayd than done.

Have his hands full.

¹ We have altered this into milestone.

Show a fayre payre of heeles.
 Put by thy purse.
 We draw both in one line (pull together).
 Take the bridle in the teeth.
 He had not one peny to blisse him.
 He must lend you eares.
 Like as the divell lookt over Lincolne.
 Take the wrong sow by th' eare (Henry VIII.'s saw).
 A tale of a tubbe.
 Beg from dur to dur.
 Few know and fewer care.
 Hit the nail on the head."

The phrase "Scarborough warning" (the blow before the word), a phrase well known in this Century, is found in p. 76. In p. 69 stands "cast water in Tems," like our "carry coals to Newcastle." Barclay's proverb is slightly altered; it becomes "when the Sunne shineth, make hay." Many of Hending's proverbs are repeated by Heywood; but the old fer from eze, fer from herte is now altered into "out of sight, out of minde." One byword is found here, that probably arose in the Thirteenth Century, when English was a thing of naught; "Jacke would be a gentleman if he could speak French," p. 61. We see "hew not too hie, lest the chips fall in thine eye," p. 141; something like this appeared in 1307. A man tells his wife, p. 141, that her tales show "long haire and short wit;" this is also an ungallant Livonian saw anent women; it may be seen in Lady Eastlake's 'Livonian Tales.' The origin of our "bone of contention" is very plain in p. 98; "the divell hath cast a bone, to set strife between you." There is a pun in p. 154, "not to my profit a prophet was I." Here is a bit of etymology, p. 143—

"First wooing for woing, banna for banning,
 The banes for my bane, then this thus scanning, Marrying, marring. And what married I than?
 A woman. As who say, woe to the man."

Another rime comes in p. 147—

"Margerie good cow gave a good meale,
 But then she cast it down again with her heele."

We see the Southern phrase hab or nab, whence came Shakespere's hob, nob; after this time the ne never came into any other phrase of this kind, I think, except will he, will he. The morals of the clergy are glanced at in p. 45, where a woman is said to be "tender as a Parson's lemman."

In the Early Writings and the Catechism of Becon (Parker Society) we see the þ struck out, for Chaucer's þwitel makes way for the verb whittle, Early Writings, p. 362. There are coalpit, law-maker, shaveling, sheepmonger; a fool is called an ass-head; carles and churls, coupled together, are opposed to gentlemen. We have seen to trick it in 1450; we now find the substantive with its Dutch sense of lineament; a trick (fashion) of apparel stands in p. 204. Becon is fond of coining adjectives with like, in the Old English way; thus he has Nero-like, jay-like, good-fellow-like (jovial); this good fellow, as a mild phrase for debauchee, lasted nearly 200 years. The word huff had long been set apart as appropriate to gallants; a proud priest is called huff-nosed, Early Writings, p. 201. Latimer is said to have used free speech (audax). In p. 43 the verb carp changes its meaning from loqui to objurgare; here the Latin carpere must have had some influence. In Cat. 415 the verb crack seems to be used in the modern Scotch sense for loqui, though a spice of jactare still hangs about the word. Men row in the same haven, not boat; they do not dream of doing a thing. There are two new phrases; men hunt, hawk, and what not, p. 254; they dispend hundreds, p. 255; here pounds are understood. There is the Scandinavian verb flare.

Among Becon's Romance words are stupor, votary (man under vows); the word sycophant stands for calumniator, as in Foxe, p. 43; the first hint of the press-gang stands in p. 235, when men are pressed for the wars. The verb saly appears, being here used for saltare, p. 373. The Teutonic and Romance are compounded in a purgatory-raker. A man of pronounced opinions is called plain as a packstaff, p. 276; a hundred years later this was made pikestaff. The holy King of France appears as Saint Lodowicke, p. 390; hence his worship cannot have taken root in England. Our modern communism is hinted at, when men make a communion, yea, a confusion of all things, Cat. 601. The word duncer is coined from Duns; we clip the last letter.

Bacon borrows the word blood-souper from Coverdale's version. He bestows the title of Pater Patriæ upon Henry VIII.; it was given to a better man a hundred years later. New and strict ideas on the Sabbath, so early as 1540, were coming in; see pp. 38 and 362. In the former page occurs a parenthesis of about 100 words in the middle of a sentence. Bacon would return a ready answer to the question, what is an Archdeacon? see Cat. 586.

In the letters of this time contained in 'Ellis' Collection,' 1538-50, we see the great contraction vytler for virtualler; the s is prefixed, as Layton's verb squench; we sometimes hear squelch in our time; in the same way, squeeze was formed from the old cwysan. The t rounds off a word, as varment. The k replaces t, as haskeness (huskiness) from host (tussis). We see snap shares (chance profits), the lading; we hear of the not (non) doing of a thing. The word house stands for its inhabitants; call up the house. Among the Adjectives is close handed and the Superlative dronkynest. We know the phrase "the Queen's rebels;" we now have for whoos resistance (resistance against whom). Among the Verbs are run in ruyme, take up money, make it over, call in a patent. The Lady Elizabeth writes that colours may give; I suppose ground must be dropped. The Passive Infinitive may govern a verb; to be rejected were to my dishonour; it may follow for, as, dedicate for service to be done.

Among the Romance words are revestre (vestry), residen-sarie, domestiques, charter party, a cane, unctuous goom (gum), maistre d'hostel, engener (engineer), grome porter. Men are said to be close (secret); Latimer talks of a cyryll and honest man; here the adjective changes its old meaning. We hear of a suspicious book; the adjective in our day has both an Active and a Passive meaning. In 1548 we read of a coronell of Germans; this is the Spanish variation, still employed by us in pronouncing; it refers to the officer who heads the column. We see Mr. Gladstone's famous phrase with bag and baggage; also for that present (nunc); here we substitute the for that. There is the new take a stay among them ; a few years later this became stay among them. There is to be busy brosshing clothes ; here an in is dropped before the Verbal Noun. We see charge the jury, the exchange is up, to pass over things, to torn over the leaf, franke caryage (without cost), hence "to frank a man." We hear of the town of Camerik (Cambrai), whence came the article cambric, already mentioned. There is a strange phrase in Series ii., vol. ii. p. 176, "Dr. Crome's canting, recanting, decanting, or rather double canting ;" this word canting was soon to be applied to thieves' patter. In Series iii., vol. iii. p. 167, Layton reviles a man as "a monk of Cant" (Kent).

In the documents of this time preserved by Foxe (vols. v. and vi.) we see the proper name Boyse, v. 510, from Boece, Boethius. The former mutenary is now cut down to mutiny ; on the other hand, Palsgrave's catour becomes caterer, vi. 199.

Among the new Substantives are shriek, inkling, white meat. In p. 190 twopence is claimed of every poll ; we should say, "twopence a head." There is a new sense of the Dutch trick in p. 409, that of dolus ; it is applied to the monks' doings. We find the compound a farewell-supper ; a man is in a wrong box ; Lord Russell cuts bloodshedding down to bloodshed, vi. 284. Bradford uses home in Udall's new sense, vii. 281 ; you hit me home ; he is the first, I think, to use hairbreadth and worldliness.

Among the Adjectives Gardiner changes the tikel of 1470 into ticklish, vi. 30 ; he talks of the Upper House (of Parliament). His victim Barnes calls Henry VIII. a whole King (a despot), v. 436, one that had more power than his father and grandfather, thanks to the Gospellers. The like is used in compounding new adjectives, as order-like (orderly). Bradford uses the new phrase come (here) and welcome, vii. 285 ; here a be must be dropped before the last word.

There is a new Relative phrase, if he be the man I take him for ; this comes in Bonner's long and amusing letter from abroad against Gardiner in 1538. Anything neglected is said to lie post alone, viii. 33 (solitary as a post).

Among the new Verbs are fly the realm, to mad (madding crowd), call to account, turn (over) my books, put them by (aside), put up your pipes (Bonner to Hooper, like our shut up), a flying report, go up to his examination, overcrowd them, settled in error, come unto a retractation (hence, come into a plan), slip the anchor-hold. The transition in the verb want from egere to cupere is very plain in v. 155; among other uses of it stands, he asked what I wanted. We have seen run his sword through him; the noun is now dropped; Bonner writes, run me through, p. 156. Men are put up (accused) by the authorities, p. 445; in our time they would be pulled up or had up.

Among the Adverbs is over and besides; Bonner complains that Hooper, like an ass, had turned the Bishop's words, "the same that was hanged," into "the same as was hanged," p. 752; men were now becoming nice about their phrases.

We hear that Bonner's common oath was, before God! v. 410; it is Chaucerian. The by is much developed in compounding, as a bye thing, bye matters, bye talk; we find it convenient to have by-work to English the parergon of Thucydides.

There is the Scandinavian glum, coupled with silence by Gardiner in vi. 36. There is the Celtic quirk, connected with law.

Among the Romance words are accent, magnitude, epitome, local, publish books, to all intents, sophister, doctress, paraphrase, palliate, unduly, impertinent (not relevant), educe, defence (at law), papistry, orders (commands), misconstrue, civilian, ingrate, a close prisoner, to term it, plain English, iteration, relevant, mockery, extenuate, lucubration. The Reformation, it will be seen by the above list, brought in many new Greek and Latin words; Lambert says he will not affirm pro or contra, v. 219. The old mislake makes way for dislike, v. 211. In p. 258 chattels, not the old catals, are coupled with goods in a Royal injunction. A man writing in 1544 speaks of the Pope-catholic clergy, viii. 32. In v. 245 Lambert uses the verb reprove for "hold as bad" and improve for "refute." The word varlet, in Bonner's mouth, comes to mean nebulo, p. 764. The new meaning of curate appears in p. 446. In p. 754 a man professes the law ; the verb had hitherto been confined to religion. The new phrase practise with a person, p. 776, appears ; it bears a bad sense. The noun pleasure is made a transitive verb by the Lady Mary in vi. 20 ; a new synonym for to favour ; it means more than please. Gardiner uses platform for scheme or policy in its present American sense, p. 25 ; he does not here connect it with its old sense of material building ; he speaks of the Gospellers as our new schoolmen, p. 33. Prince Edward is able to construe and parse, p. 351 ; that is, tell the parts of speech. Gardiner uses policy in p. 37 for two different things, sapientia and consilium. He opposes the word profane to holy, speaking of everyday life, p. 63. Ridley, when on the Eucharist, talks of annihilation of bread, p. 313. The phrase I pass not was often now used for our "take my stand on ;" see p. 315. A man, whose arrangements have been made useless by a change of purpose in his enemy, professes himself sore disappointed, p. 401.

Lambert, in 1538, compares something futile to the moon shining in the water, v. 216 ; hence our all moon-shine. There is the phrase every vat (vessel) shall stand on his own bottom, p. 533 ; Bunyan changed the vat into tub when using this proverb. Gardiner cares not to talk, as (though) butter would not melt in his mouth, vi. 37. Ridley tells an objector, you would move a saint, p. 331. The word amiss was always a favourite with English punsters ; in v. 447 a Gospeller says that the mass was called miss beyond sea, for that all is amiss in it. Gardiner declares that using the term The Lord for Deus is a token of heresy, v. 507. One idea of King Edward's rebels was, that they were not bound to obey laws made before he was twenty-one, v. 773. In vi. 51 Gardiner (here, at least, a sad blunderer) speaks of the King as one of the three Estates of the realm. The Bishop, though some call him a Papist, refuses to play the pope-holy, as the old term was ; it evidently meant "a sanctimonious prig," as is here hinted. He approves of religion being set forth in Greek and Latin, which are well fixed; "but as for the English tongue, itself hath not continued in one form of understanding 200 years; . . . it shall hardly contain religion long when it cannot last itself," vi. 37. Gardiner could not foresee the stability that Tyndale and Cranmer were to give to this fleeting English which now seemed unworthy to be the handmaid of religion. We hear something of verse-making at Winchester, vi. 223; Bishop Gardiner, about 1538, caused the schoolmaster of the College to make verses on the King's supremacy as against the Pope; these were learnt by the boys, who then made verses of their own on the same theme. Gardiner uses while in its Northern sense of usque ad, vi. 42. He distinguishes between a letter of German fashion of the Chancery hand and a letter of the Secretary hand, vi. 27; in the same page he tells us that an honest Englishman will put off his cap on seeing the King's seal. Somerset excuses the Government for not interfering with the profane rimes of the Gospellers, saying that Pasquil at Rome has always been tolerated by the Popes, even when their tyranny was most extreme and when they themselves were his butt, vi. 35.

There are many poems in Hazlitt's Collection, vols. iii. and iv., ranging between 1537 and 1550. The ow replaces o, as prowl; in iii. 312 the two forms ketch and catch stand in one line. The t is struck out, as popery for popetry; it is added, as hoist for the old hoise; it replaces þ, as tyght for the thiht (solidus) of 1440, wynd and water tyght. A rustic contracts gentleman into gemman, iv. 10, and uses zoner for sooner; also yche am for ego sum. The r is inserted; the old braided hair becomes broadered, iii. 238, the broidered of our Bibles; the Teutonic braid and the French broder were confused. The Vocative master parson becomes mas parson in a rustic's mouth; hence the Scotch mass John. Among the Substantives are dribbler, callet, jacke daw; this Jack was now prefixed to many nouns, as a Jack lout, iii. 229; we see a Judas kisse, p. 235. There is the new phrase have (make) a better showe, iii. 239. A chief is described as formost of the ryng, p. 290; hence ringleader had already been coined. A sot is always crying fyll the pot, Jone! p. 310; this was the usual name for a poor woman, and it lasted for 200 years; we know Shakespeare's greasy Joan. A man has a knacke to say things (of saying things), iv. 9. Matters are on a hubble shubble (huffle scuffle), iii. 312. A peasant speaks of the priestly power as a galows gay gifte, iv. 13; this gallus is still a slang term for magnus. We see crust and crum coupled in p. 44. Among the Adjectives we remark bousy (ebrius), from an English word of 1280. The old maidenlike reappears after a very long sleep; there is also Christianlike.

Among the Verbs are I knowe whates a clocke, iii. 281, beat (cudgel) his brayne, take in (recipere). In iv. 5 stands the old expletive, so mut I thee (so may I thrive!), the last appearance, I think, of the Old English theon. There is masse me no messinges to a priest, p. 15, like Lord Derby's knee me no knees. Thieves lyft a man from his good, p. 40; this is the Gothic hlifan, the Greek klep, meaning the same; hence comes our shoplifter. The word tease keeps its old violent meaning (lacerare) in p. 63, where wolves tease sheep; in Yorkshire the machine for tearing wool is still called a teaser. When we put a thing away, we lay it in some cupboard or safe place; this sense of the adverb appears in iii. 138, lay money away. Bishop Gardiner is called, in p. 263, so so a preacher; our so so still means mediocre. People are fetched by the whole dosens, p. 264; something comes by fyttis, p. 295; in old times the Singular, not the Plural, would have been used after the distributive preposition. Caxton had staked upon a thing; we here see to borow (money) on garments, iv. 59. There is a curious omission of against in the phrase housing (which is) wynd and water tyght, p. 52. We see the source of the future tirra lirra in iii. 321; a tirlary typpe; the tirlary is here made to jingle with whirlary. A man says he often does a miracle, iv. 13; the answer is, the devell ye do! a new phrase. A horse is addressed with ree who! this last must be a corruption of ho! (stop), p. 16, something like our wo-ho! In the same page stands God spede us and the plough!

There are the Dutch words ruffle (brag) and trick up (ornare). There is the Celtic gull (decipere) and roger (soon to become roque), iv. 44.

The Romance words are conscionable (conscientious), iii. 228, to poche (rob), iv. 41, serving man, carion crow, trinket, cassoc, farthingale. An impudent fellow is called Jack sauce, iii. 242; and his father addresses him with the scornful Sir, p. 231. Two lines in p. 281 refer to the sea—

“The compas may stand awrye,
But the carde wyll not lye.”

This card (our chart) comes into the later speak by the card. In the parable, Dives is opposed to Pauper, p. 286; the last word is often in our mouths now. A woman is exhorted to wear sober apparel, p. 239; she answers that her clothes are not drunk. In pp. 290 and 295 the word pluresye (perhaps in joke) stands for plethora; Shakespere and others imitated this. Men abuse their tongues against holiness, p. 256; we here see how the verb began to mean vituperare. A rustic calls the mass vengeance holy, iv. 11, a new phrase. The Adverb cherly is used to encourage a horse onward, p. 16; Orlando was to encourage Adam in the same way. In p. 35 we hear of gaudy chere; hence the gaudy days at the Universities. Men are asked what country men they be, p. 42; this refers to their shires. Persons may be defended, but meadows are defenced in p. 53; we now clip the de in this sense; defend had led to the noun defence, and this latter to another verb defence. The noun Popistant is coined, iii. 262; perhaps an imitation of Protestant.

The popular poet of 1550 in iii. 278 wishes that merchants would stick to the sea and not buy up the lands of the gentry; this new practice had come up within the last eighty years. In iv. 64 it is hinted that drunkenness had hitherto been confined to Duche folke or Flemynghes, but it is now rooting itself among the English. A new noun, God-terer, is coined to express a swearer, p. 61. There is the proverb, grete boost and small roost (roast), p. 66. I give a specimen of the earliest thieves' slang we have, from p. 69—

“With bousy cove maimed nace
 Tear the patryng cove in the darkman cace
 Docked the dell for a copper meke
 His watch shall feng a prounces nobchete
 Cyarum by salmon and thou shalt pek my jere
 In thy gan for my watch it is nace gere
 For the bene bouse my watch hath a coyn.”

The foreign style of speaking English is first imitated in pp. 46 and 47 ; a quack says—

“Me non spek Englys by my fayt ;
 My servaunt spek you what me sayt.

Dys infant rumpre ung grand postum,
 By got, he ala mort tuk under thum.”

The dog Latin in iii. 320 is not so good as Molière’s—

“This alum finum
 Is bonus than vinum
 Ego volo quare
 Cum tu drinkare.

Juro, per Deum,
 Hoc est lifum meum
 Quia drinkum stalum
 Non facere malum.”

Hall, in his Chronicle, uses the Scandinavian verb baffull (disgrace) ; he explains it as a word of great reproach among the Scotch ; see Skeat’s Dictionary.

In the ‘Life of Sir Peter Carew’ (Maclean) we see deck (of ship), netting, wynge of an army. Wallop, in 1543, talks of cutting between an army and home, p. 124, Appendix. A sunken ship is to be wayed upp, p. 129. There is the phrase be aforehands with him, p. 139. Among the Romance words are pyke (the weapon), mortaires (mortars), to bombast a doublet with cotton, an awauntcourreur ; mountes of earth were to become mounds a few years later ; most of these words occur in Wallop’s letters in 1543. There are, besides, cordage, the patrone (master) of a ship ; enemies assemble in great troupes, p. 136 ; we stand in doubtful tearmes with France, p. 142.

In 1548 William Turner put forth his book on the Names of Herbes, printed by the English Dialect Society.

He had travelled much abroad, and throws light on foreign pronunciation. He tells us that the poticaries clipped the first a in asparagus, p. 17; sparrow grass came later. He says that the two forms mallowe and mallo are both in use, p. 50; the English for quercus may be either oke or eke, p. 66; and brassica may be either cole or keele (kale), p. 20. He goes back to the true old morbery, not mulberry, p. 9. Both the forms cresse and kerse are in use, p. 55. The old affodil is written daffodil, p. 10; this is said to come from the French fleur d'affodil. Turner insists on writing wad (woad) "and not ode, as some corrupters of the English tongue do nickname it," p. 40; we remember how Woden became Odin. The German ei must have been sounded like French ê at this time; Turner writes Rhene and eich (oak), of course giving the English sound to these letters; he writes the German ougen for oculi, p. 84; tusent for mille, p. 24; still the form baume (arbor) appears. The Germans seem still to have sounded their w as we do. Turner has the new substantives buckwheate, kydney beane, twopeny grasse; Jack was becoming such a common prefix that in p. 89 a plant appears as Jacke of the hedge. The old nightshade, after a sleep of many centuries, reappears in p. 89. In p. 77 with us stands for apud nos, "in our speech;" this is a development of the idiom of 1470, an holy prophet with God (in the sight of God). Among the Romance words are carot, larche, raspes (raspberry); there is blew-bottel for cyanus; the word archichoke, p. 23, comes straight from the Italian, the ar being the Arabic al (the). Turner says that in England we have two forms for one plant, cynkfoly or fyve fynghed grasse, p. 66. He always tries to Teutonise new words; thus he thinks swallowurt should be used for the strange plant called schwalbenwurt by the Duche men, p. 17; he wishes the German durchwassz to be called thorowwax in English, p. 85. When he gives mangolt as the Duche for English bete, p. 19, he little foresaw the future mangelwurzel. Instead of errata at the end of his book he gives fautes escaped in the printyng, a pretty long list.

Latimer's 'Sermons and Remains' of this time (Parker Society) retain some old forms, as a gainer (readier) way; there are both manqueller and mankiller (homicide). The a is prefixed in aweary (fessus); it is clipped in pose (appose); Chaucer's hochepot becomes hotchpotch. There are the Substantives, a put off, income, hanger on, a standing (thieves' station), a laughing matter, tussock, gun-maker. Latimer coins shavery, something like slavery, to express the robbery of the Church; 'Sermons,' p. 100. We seem to see the origin of our duffer in p. 121, "there stood by him a dubber, one Doctor Dubber," an ignorant priest. Latimer uses mingle-mangle, a word for pigs' food used in "my country" (Leicestershire). He employs a glimmering for "a slight recollection," p. 174. A man may be a firebrand. A curate's wages, nine or ten pounds, may be earned by some three-halppenny priest; 'Remains,' p. 29. The word stock seems to be used for property, not merely for cattle, in p. 112.

Among the Adjectives is white-livered, quick (in the sense of quick-tempered); 'Sermons,' p. 207. As to the Pronouns, we see they were none of his to give, p. 158; no man is any thing near unto mine age, p. 251; usurers take forty in the hundred, p. 279, a new commercial phrase. Shakespere talks of "your but," Latimer of St. Paul's nots and nons; 'Remains,' p. 18.

Among the new Verbs are overhear, brazen it, lamb, and the phrases, blow men to ashes (with ordnance), raise rents, keep touch (agreement) with, an article is far fetched (brought from a distance), do more hurt than good. Latimer uses prittle-prattle prayers, and also to pittle-pattle, whence comes our pit-a-pat. We have seen strike in the sense of vadere; we now find chop in (cut in). The verb is dropped in no doubt of that.

As to Prepositions, we see the Northern expletive, with a wanniaunt, 'Sermons,' p. 119, soon to be altered into with a vengeance. There is the new phrase, leave them at adventure (to chance), p. 120.

There are the Scandinavian shelf (at sea) and trudge. There is the Celtic perk (wax proud).

Among the Romance words are imposture, Anabaptistical, king's minority, cursorily, brutality (brutishness), suspend judgment, valuer, salad, propriety (peculiarity), phantastical

(unreal), to fantasy (putare), clerkly. In the well-known 'Sermon on the Card' we see the technical deal, suit, heart, turn up your trump, which is also seen as triumph, p. 16. The word dame is used as the counterpart of master, hence a dame's school. Men make a dividend (division) of spoil, p. 31. The mock is employed in compounds like our sham, mock-gospeller; of this kind of words mock auction still survives. The word satisfactory (expiatory) appears, used in a very different sense from ours. The famous word pasquyl appears for satire, as before in Elyot. Latimer, when removed from his see, became a quondam; he also speaks of quondamship, p. 154. We see satrapa and a caveat. The old even in composition was falling away, for we see co-helper; this co had appeared in commoder. The new sense of civil appears; an honest civil woman, p. 180. Where we say, "thanks to my trouble," the old phrase was gramercy labour, p. 213. We hear of new spirits (homines), p. 229, hence our "choicé spirits;" ghost and soul had long been used in this sense. Men are made of certain metal, p. 393; this spelling was later to be changed. A man who cheats another thinks himself a wise merchant, p. 401; the word might bear a bad meaning about this time. We hear of fooleries, p. 425, and moreover of follies, in the Plural. John the Baptist is called a clergyman; 'Remains,' p. 82; the first instance, I think, of this word. The huge farthingales worn by women are called *round-about*s, p. 108. Latimer says, "the Devil shall go for my money" (he is the one for me); 'Sermons,' p. 77.

As to old customs, noblemen are complained of by many, because they lie in bed till eight in the morning; 'Sermons,' p. 255. A certain rich man, when dying, utters nothing but the oath, Wounds and sides! p. 277. Latimer protested against burials within the City, and wished that Curates might be appointed to the gaols. On St. Stephen's day it was usual to bleed horses; 'Remains,' p. 100. Latimer confesses that he has been too apt to use the oath, yea, by St. Mary! p. 79; most men in his day contented themselves with Mary! He was once much blamed by a Bishop for speaking of the Lord's Supper, a new term, not often used by the Doctors; 'Sermons,' p. 121. He tells us that many punningly spoke of the new Homilies as homelies (simple stuff), p. 121; the people would sometimes talk so as to prevent these documents from being heard in Church. He remarks on Abiathar's conspiracy, "it is marvel if any mischief be in hand, if a priest be not at some end of it" (the bottom of it); 'Sermons,' p. 114. He speaks of bribery and its returns; "giffe-gaffe was a good fellow," p. 140; Scott has something of the kind. Latimer has various proverbs, to be found in Heywood.

Leland's remarks on his journey through England were given to the King in 1546, and were soon afterwards edited by Bale. The Antiquary had a licence in 1533 to search all the Convent Libraries. He is here said by his editor to have been learned in both Brittyshe, Saxonyshe, and Walshe; he might well call himself Antiquarius. No Englishman probably professed to understand Old English for 300 years before Leland; one of the fruits of the Reformation was to breed men like him, Parker, and Foxe. A man may be an unprofitable clod, a new term of abuse. The sh was coming in; Gower's was (aqua) becomes wash. There is the new adverb lernedlye, which is an unusual formation. We hear of dogged doynges of Anabaptists (brutish or mad). The verb wish seems to imitate order or command, taking an Accusative and Infinitive; I wyshe all to consydre. The of now follows careful; careful of good learning. The very old sense of for (quod attinet ad) is carried, a step further; lerned for hys tyme. We hear of the prymative Church, to barbaryse, stacyoner. We see monstrouose buyldinges (ingentia); this sense lingers in our monstrous fine. There is laysy (lazy), from the Old French lasche (laxus). The Universities are said to be not all clere in destroying old manuscripts; that is, "free from blame." Leland uses the word Romanist, with a new sense widely apart from that of Roman or Romancer. He applies fanatycal to the Anabaptists, calling them chymney prechers and benche bablers.

Bale seems to have written his play of 'Kynge Johan

(Camden Society) about the year 1550; he set the example of not observing the unities of time or place, as many years elapse between the scenes, and these shift from England to Italy; he first brought secular history upon our stage. He has some old forms, as backe (vesper-tilio), mesel (leper), slypper (lubricus), the moste (maximus) knave. In p. 80 stands a wassail song, the six lines all ending in ayle, something in Chaucer's style. The old wone (mos) now takes a t at the end, as wont, p. 27; we hear of the Pope's crosse keys, p. 32; there is the old alliteration kyng and keyser, p. 5. Among the Verbs are slip aside, bear them grudge, set a good face upon it, cast over your country (our throw over), p. 87. In p. 62 stands our idiomatic go about thy besynes (get you gone). The source of our verb swig is very plain in p. 78, where a man proposes to swynke a draught; a few years later sprig was to be substituted for sprenge. One of our short sharp phrases appears in p. 51; John cites the Gospel; the answer is, "Tush, gospell or no, ye must make," etc. In p. 66 comes downe on your marry bones! Among the Romance words are unplesant, dewtyful; also no mater to yow, pyed monk, discharge his oath (in the sense of fungi). The Dominicans are called Jacobytes (not Jacobins), p. 18; I have seen this form in Latin verses of the Thirteenth Century. A man is told that he loses no ceremony, p. 35; hence our "stand on ceremony." A person, greeting another, says, your servant, with no verb, p. 44. A whole French line is inserted in the English text, p. 26; there is also sance pere (peerless), bone vyage, per dee. In p. 73 stands the proverb lyke Lorde, lyke chaplayne; we say, "like master, like man."

Bale elsewhere uses the Scandinavian jabber.

William Patten wrote an account of the Duke of Somerset's march into Scotland in 1548; this may be found in Arber's 'English Garner,' iii. 51. The u replaces o, as gut (canalis); there is a well-known Gut near Oxford. The b is struck out, as Camal for Campbell. The d is inserted, as Dandy for Daniel, p. 91. The l replaces r, as to duddle (our diddle, decipere) for the old dydrian, p. 129.

Among the new Substantives are inroad, loophole, onset.

There are the old forms All hallowentide (elsewhere written Allhallontyd), gadling; former represents our forefather, p. 59. There are the phrases handful of men, be at odds (far apart), brood geese, race (fuga). There is the terse field or no field, p. 63. Young Edward VI. is said to be of great hope, p. 66; that is, he does not hope himself, but begets hope in others; he thus stands at the head of our young hopefuls. In p. 71 we read of Tauthrie laces in a list of superstitious trumpery; these were sold at St. Awdry's fair at Ely; we now make them tawdry. The old handgun here becomes simply a gun, p. 140. A nobleman is spoken of in his absence as his Lordship, p. 142. Among the Adjectives we remark within the full sight of, breast high, choicest men, oaten cake. The Pronoun appears in a new way, run himself to death, p. 123; there is fight it out, p. 109. We have seen at each other; there is now at one another, p. 133.

Among the Verbs are puff (in walking), blow with powder (here we add up), a rising hill (hence rising ground), give ground, keep on (march onward). A man when astonished blesses him, p. 64; hence our bless me! when we are surprised. The verb pack gets a new meaning in p. 104, we were packing (departing). There had always been an old phrase "slay at war;" in p. 91 we see "chase them at the spear point." In p. 103 men play for a stake.

There is the Scandinavian tit (equus), p. 92; it means something very small.

We see here the number of French words brought in by the soldier's trade, such as demi-lance, pensioner, pioneer, Provost Marshal, battery, covert (for soldiers), tenable, trumpet (trumpeter), to plant ordnance, field piece, fore rank, a flank (in flank), to flank, culverin, order of march. There is, moreover, the Spanish camisado, p. 89; Spain had now replaced France as the head of the military world. In p. 91 charge expresses ruere, to charge at a man in a skirmish. Chaucer's pellet (from a cannon) now gives way to bullet, p. 118. The place occupied by a general is called his post, p. 111. Certain knights in the van are called Sergeants; this word was henceforth to be military as well as legal, p. 120; we also hear in the same page of the Gentleman Harbinger (Quartermaster-General). The guns are called missive engines, p. 121 ; we now make this adjective Passive, not Active ; Lord Macaulay has been blamed for calling a musket a missile weapon. We see the phrases gratify, deponent, good literature (scholarship), diary, common sense, proffer battle, suitably, vent (opening), to calendar, infest them, with present mind, the double of it, relent, punies (juniors), my notes. An epigram shows neatness, p. 61 ; inhuman is used for uncourteous, p. 66 ; the nobles in the army are called the dignity, as we say the quality, p. 73 ; profane authors are opposed to Scriptural writers, p. 80. The words brave, bravery, are used much as brag, pp. 98 and 114 ; hence our brave it out. The word villain is opposed to gentleman, p. 125, a late instance. The new verb endeavour now becomes a noun, do mine endeavour, p. 56. In p. 57 demerits stand for services. A fort is made defensible, p. 59 ; this adjective now becomes Passive in its meaning, not Active as of old. Somerset has a chariot of his own, sumptuous for cost, and easy for carriage, p. 93 ; this is a very early instance of the vehicle in England. We hear of both a retire and a retreat. The word plot is now applied to works of the mind ; "the plot of my prologue," p. 75.

We light upon the proverb, say truth and shame the devil, p. 61.

The word Briton, as usual, is used by an Englishman, whenever Scots are to be won over. There is no difference in language between the two countries, p. 64. Edward VI. is called a right Briton, both bred and born, p. 67.

"Coeamus in unum, Simus et unanimes per secula cuncta Britanni" (p. 61), a wish that seems likely to be granted. It is remarked that the Scots call a hill a bray, p. 62 ; loon and tyke were their favourite words of abuse, p. 114. The Fire Cross and its use are described at length in p. 63 ; it is never employed but in urgent need. The Scots speak of horsemen as prickers, p. 63 ; to prick in this sense dates from 1280. The Gael of the North are called Irish, p. 63. The Northern dialect is set down by the Englishman in

p. 75 ; Huntley is made to say, "in gude faith, I wade (the marriage) sud gae furth, and (I) haud weil with (it)." Scots are allowed to gae their gate, p. 84. Patten in p. 86 notes the Scotch custom of speaking of a nobleman's son and heir as the Master. It is remarked that the Scotch use sober for parrus, as a sober company, p. 101. They had kept the word inland, long dropped in the South ; the inland men were the best in their army, p. 111. The difference between the Scotch lord and laird is explained in p. 125 ; the latter answers to the English esquire.

In the Church Homilies, put forth by Edward VI. in 1549, the word goose stands for stultus. In the beginning of the Homily against Contention, we learn that a Gospeller used to be reviled as a new-broached brother ; here the last word is equivalent to Puritan, much as Strafford used it of Hampden. The verb broach is now applied to something else besides a cask. Trevisa had already used same with ; we now see one body with, made one with Christ. There are the new Verbs embody and besot. There is the parenthesis, as I may so speak (ut ita dicam). Tyndale's phrase so far off from having it is now altered into so far from rejoicing (Obedience, No. 2).

The time, when England broke away from the Italian yoke, falls in precisely with the time when the diction of her bards was greatly changed for the better. Langland, true genius though he might be, was wrong in employing so vast a number of French words in his work ; the Passus Decimus-Quartus of his Vision has one French word for two English, counting the nouns, verbs, and adverbs alone. Chaucer penning a hymn to the Virgin is most different from Chaucer laughing over the pranks of naughty lads at the Universities ; in the former case he heaps up his French words to a wondrous extent. The same tendency may be seen in Lydgate, Hawes, Dunbar, and their brethren ; the worst sinners in this respect being monks and writers of Church legends. To prove my point, I give a stanza from a poem composed by the Abbot of Gloucester in 1524 ; we may almost call it the last dying strains, somewhat prosaic in truth, of the Old Creed:—

 Joy, incomparable myrth without heaviness,
 Love with Charity and grace Celestiall,
 Lasting interminable, lacking no goodness.
 In that City virtue shall never cease,
 And felicity no Soule shall misse,
 Magnifying the name of the Kinge of Blisse.”

“ This compendious Extract compiled was new,
 A thousand yeere 5 hundred fower and twenty
 From the birthe of our Saviour Christ Jesue,
 By the Reverend Father of worthy memory,
 Willm Malverne, Abbot of this Monastery,
 Whome God preserve in long life and prosperity,
 And after death him graunt Eternall Felicity.”¹

But about the time that Tyndale was giving the English Bible to his countrymen in their own tongue, and that Cromwell was hammering the monks, a new soul seems to have been breathed into English poetry. Surrey and Wyatt stand at the head of the new school, and show themselves Teutons of the right breed; they clearly had no silly love for lumbering Latinised stuff. The true path, pointed out by them, was soon to be followed in this Sixteenth Century by Buckhurst, Gascoigne, Sidney, and by two men greater still. Even Southwell, who died in the Pope's behalf, cleaves fast to the new Teutonic diction of his brother bards. The Reformation has been called an uprising of Teutonism against Latinism; nowhere does this come out clearer than in English poetry.

But this Sixteenth Century had a widely different effect on our Prose. Latin was the great link between our own Reformers and those of other lands; and the temptation was strong to bring into vogue Latin terms for the new ideas in religion that were taking root in our island. Theology was the great subject of the age; and King Henry VIII. remarked to his Parliament in 1545: “I am very sorry to know and hear how unreverently that most precious jewel, the Word of God, is disputed, rimed, sung, and jangled in every ale house and tavern, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same." Besides this intense thirst after religious discussion, our fathers later on in the Century saw for the first time the authors of Greece and Rome clad in an English dress; and the sailors who bore the English flag round the world were always printing wondrous tales of their wanderings; Plymouth, as well as Oxford, was making her influence felt. Our land, therefore, owned at the end of the Sixteenth Century thousands of new terms, which would have seemed strange to Hawes and Roy; a fair store of words was being made ready for Shakespere, whose genius would not bear cramping. The people, for whom he was to write, had a strong taste for theology, for the classics, and for sea roving; each of these tastes brought in shoals of new words.

It is to the ripe and mellow wisdom of Cranmer (1550) that we owe the English Prayer Book almost as it now stands. It is his best monument; he had no vulgar wish to sweep away what was old, unless the sacrifice were called for by the cause of Truth. We have seen that some of the Book's formularies date from Wickliffe's day; others, such as the Bidding prayer, betoken a wish to yoke together the Teutonic and the Romance in pairs, like acknowledge and confess, humble and lowly, goodness and mercy, assemble and meet, pray and beseech.¹ Even so the Law talks of yielding and paying. In the Collects, the proportion of French to English is much the same as in Chaucer's prose earlier, and as Addison was to write later. Lord Macaulay long ago contrasted our English prayers, compiled when our language was full of sap and vigour, with the older Latin forms translated by Cranmer, the work of an age of third-rate Latinity. Yet the Archbishop's work was held cheap by some of his flock. The stalwart peasantry of our Western shires, the men who rose against his system, called this new Prayer Book nothing but "a Christmas game."

It is well known how great an influence Luther and Calvin have had upon their respective tongues; in like manner, one effect of the Reformation was to keep England steady to her old speech. As we have always had the voices of Tyndale and Cranmer ringing in our ears week after week for the last three Centuries, we have lost but few words since the time of these worthies; the most remarkable of our losses are bolled, daysman, to ear, silverling, and meteyard, found in parts of Scripture not much read. Hearne, writing 170 years later, mourned over the substitution of modern words for rede (consilium) and behight (promisit), both used by Sternhold in his version of the Psalms, made in the days of Edward VI. "Strange alterations," says the Antiquary, "all for the worse."

Thomas Lever (Arber's Reprint) was one of the most renowned Protestant preachers about 1550; he came from Lancashire, and uses the Northern braste for burst, p. 35. He writes yearthe for terra; he uses cotinger for cottager, just as the n came into messenger; he tells us that country folk spoke of the new Homilies as the humbles, p. 65. In p. 82 we hear of cattle being given into a stocke, for the relief of the poor; hence come our joint stock companies. There are the phrases greedygut and tunne belyed, p. 119. There is a new sense of over in p. 142; take a ferme over their heades. We see the word vailles, p. 82, which seems to mean here commoda, coming from avail; it was later employed for gifts to servants.

In Mr. Furnivall's 'Jyl of Brentford's Testament' there are some pieces dating from about 1550. The needless w appears in wholsome, p. 23. In p. 23 stands fight with toothe and nayle, a new phrase; the Devil's secretary bears the name of Bloodydybone, p. 28; whom we now couple with raw head. Thieves are mentioned in connexion with Shoters Hyll, p. 25. A girl may be ordered to sit on the pillar of repentance, p. 40; in Scotland it is a stool. In p. 41 we see over again coupled, I think for the first time; the over meaning per; in do it over, as we see, the Preposition is placed after the case. In p. 25 girls go to a dancing school to learn facions; the first instance, I think, of this Plural. There are Satannicall and intoxicate. We have seen pray thee thirty years earlier; this is now shortened; pray do it, p. 41.

Crowley's 'Epigrams' (Early English Text Society, Extra Series) date from this time. A beare fyght takes place in Paryse garden every Sunday; the substantive first mentioned is in our day used of men, not animals. The verb pitch takes a new meaning, that of torquere. There is the Shakesperian oath, by cocke and by pye, p. 19. The word libertine, as we see by the context, means much the same as democrat, p. 112.

We may glance at the Scotch Catechism, set forth by Archbishop Hamilton in 1551 (republished in 1882). There is an evident attempt to move with the times; the Pope's name is kept in the background, and priests' misbehaviour is freely admitted. The duties of the Sunday are enforced, such as rest from labour, sermons, almsdeeds, instruction of bairns and servants; dancing, dicing, "and specially carreling and wanton synging in the kirk," are forbidden. The Archbishop is far more Sabbatarian than Luther was. We hear that Saturday, like Friday in our own time, was regarded with superstition; on that day craftsmen, sailors, and travellers would begin no work or enterprise (fol. 23). There appear certain old phrases, which had been lost in the South, such as file (inquinare), twyn (separare), and others. The Scotch form suppose for si is in full vigour. We see coackit and Ackes, where the t is dropped, as in Coverdale's Bible. The Scotch had already turned manrede into manrent; we now often have hetrent (hatred). There is Pottिंगareis for apothecaries; to the former word we owe the proper name Pottinger. The b is cast out, as in chamyrland (chamberlain); clothes becomes clayis (claes), losing the th. When we here see stolen often written stowin, we remember how col and bel became cou and bew in France. When plesand (jucundus) is written, there is an attempt to supplant the French ending by that of the Northern English Participle. The w is still written for v, as cowatous.

There are the new Substantives cottar and tyredness

(fatigue). A word, constantly now in the mouths of Scotch peasants, appears; breid is maid of mony pickillis of corne (fol. 142); "a wee puckle straw" is often to be heard in our days. The sum is used in forming new Adjectives; we here find lesum (lawful) and langsum; the French le in the North was always favoured, as in the case of leal. The form manly is used for Christ's human nature. The siclike (swa-lic-lic) is employed for talis; siclike ane lufe (fol. 40). We see the verb eke used, differing from English use, to translate addere.

Among the Romance words are blake maillis (the Irish blak rent), singlar (peculiar), huirmaister (whoremaster), document (proof); these two last appear in the Anglican Homilies ten years later.

We have already considered the earlier version of the 'Song of Lady Bessy' (Percy Society, vol. xx.); the later version seems to belong to this time; there is the word slave, which was now coming into use. The piece seems to have been written in Lancashire or some Northern county, for a Princess is spoken of as a proper wench, p. 11. The l is clipped; we hear more than once of a gent (gentleman); I can well remember Albert Smith's treatise upon this being. We see keep an appointment.

There are two plays of about 1550 in Dodsley's Collection (Hazlitt, vol. ii.), Lusty Juventus and the Disobedient Child. In p. 273 breech is used, no longer for a garment, but for the hinder part of the person. There is the Shakesperian mome, meaning stultus. In p. 277 stands young Lively and Lusty, which is something new. In p. 271 stands when all is said and done, differing from the old version of this. There is the Scandinavian word bang. We see in service time, where divine ought to follow the Preposition. There is the new phrase face out the matter.

Hutchinson (Parker Society) was one of the Reformers, who published about 1550. In some verses by Dean Bill, prefixed to the volume, p. 10, we see the very old word æghwær (ubique), long preserved in the North, in the form of each where. Hutchinson seems to have come from the North, for he uses barne (puer) and corse (mutare), which last word puzzles the modern editor, p. 321.

The old yea, written ie, was now making way for aye, which is often repeated in p. 336. There are the new Substantives picklock, seacoal; the former is rather different from Occleve's unpick a coffer. There is the old Northern God's man in p. 253, where we should say man of God; our lady's man is a later formation. In p. 286 we read of children following the wild swing of youth. Men attack something tooth and nail, p. 213; tooth-ache is also revived after a long sleep. There is the Shakesperian it was a merry world, before, etc., p. 8. The word Dutch is now used for Hollander; in p. 17 a distinction is made at last between Dutch and the Almaines' tongue; the former has God, the latter Gott. There is the new form all-knowing coined, p. 193, just as eal-craeftig had been struck off hundreds of years earlier. We hear of the broad seal of England, p. 251. The old kindly bears its rightful meaning of naturalis in our Litany; but in p. 322 we read of David's kindly table; here the word seems to take the new sense of benignus, as kind had done 250 years earlier. In p. 39 iron at Elisha's bidding hoves above water; the verb had meant manere; Minot, who was a Northern man, had used it in connexion with water, as Hutchinson does. The verb gather is used for intelligere in p. 325; "gather from a text that," etc. Heretics may rack a Scriptural word, p. 131, to prove their own figments.

Among the Romance words are colligener (member of a college), which comes often, a common table (for eating), p. 203, bowser (bursar), losing an r in the middle like palsy and sexton; also expiation, peasant. A plaintiff tries his suit, p. 327; we transfer the verb to the judge. A knave is to be set forth in his colours, p. 335; hence "in his true colours." The word trinity loses its theological sense in p. 81; a trinity of suns. St. Paul's friend is called Captain Lysias, p. 329. Hutchinson shows us how the knowledge of Greek was making rapid strides; he uses the word bribe-taker, p. 318, which compound, I suspect, he took from Demosthenes ; a vain repetition becomes tautologia, p. 122. Unlike Luther, he calls Aristotle "the noble and worthy philosopher," p. 170. He has a devout belief in the Sibyls, p. 177. He disagrees with Zuinglius, thinking the Eucharist something more than a bare and naked metaphor, p. 260. He often inserts Greek characters and words into his English text ; Protestant divines were now leaving Latimer far behind, who avowed that he knew no Greek.

In the documents of this time, set forth in Tytler's Edward VI., we see the old sound of oy still existing, since there is a pun in i. 210, where London is called Troy untrue. There are the Substantives a runabout, tickle-ness, heart-burning, doings and sayings ; heat takes the sense of ira, i. 170. A pirate sends ashore his mate, i. 271, the first instance, I think, of this word being applied to a ship's officer. The Pope is called His Holowness, ii. 81. The adjective warm is employed for iratus, i. 67 ; and tubberly appears. In ii. 44 a man keeps his own counsel ; here the use of own is something peculiar ; counsel in this phrase bears to this day its old sense of a secret. In this page the old Double Negative may be seen in full force, employed by Lord Arundel. The most remarkable change in the Verbs is the new Past Participle ; this letter, having been written, hath, etc. ; the increasing study of Greek would bring these new forms of speech into vogue. The Northern egg (incitare) is now coming South, i. 298. The Active verb mind (curare) now takes an Infinitive ; he seemeth not to mind to leave it (care about leaving it), i. 297. There are the new phrases take exercise, take his oath, put out of countenance, cut off a tale.

Among the Romance words are certainty, decipher, temporize, broil (rixa), billet (epistola), reciproque (reciprocal), pique (rixa), brush (for the hair), virago, proveable, finances. Many new military terms appear ; enseigns of footmen and horsemen, i. 53 ; the new French form, Colonel ; a man has soldiers in regiment, ii. 182, where a new sense of the word begins to come in. We hear of the Great Turk, who is also called Le Grand Seigneur ; also of his Bassa (Pasha) ;

the Turkish fleet is called an armata, ii. 252. In the same page the old Genoways become Genoeses, like Milton's Chineses. The word tromperie is used for deceit, ii. 93, as before in Caxton; attend bears its French sense of expectare, ii. 93. The word pinnace is used as an equivalent for galley, i. 284. A man wishes for a few lines from his friend, i. 345. Young Philip II. is said to continue in a Spanish gravity, i. 303; this would earlier have been expressed by sadness. Paget boasts that he never loved extremes, i. 24; here the adjective is made a substantive.

There is the saying, "I would not be in some of their coats for five marks!" i. 171. King Edward takes the French envoys to hunt in Hyde Park, i. 288.

In Halliwell's 'Letters of the Kings,' vol. ii., Edward VI. uses the new phrase run a match, p. 53. He has praiseworthy, an odd compound, gendarmery, and the new hatchment.

In Wood's 'Letters of Illustrious Ladies,' vol. ii., a Scotch lady talks of a bawnking, p. 195 (whence comes bawn); it seems to be distinguished from a castle; the old form was barmeken. We hear of lords and their ladies (wives), p. 39. A wife addresses her husband in a letter as, Good mine own; a Duchess writes patronisingly to a Minister as, my good Cecil, p. 248. A will stands; a reprover shakes a person up, p. 54; make clear with him (clear off his accounts), p. 49; lay a corpse forth (out); a room falls void; have (get the best of him), p. 134. Among the Romance words are unnatural, conserve of damascenes (damsons), to feast men, depart this world. Florence appears as a woman's name, p. 89. Elizabeth signs herself Cor Rotto at the end of a letter, p. 280; the study of Italian was coming in. The word Christian is used in a new and restricted sense in p. 240; it is applied to certain men who are sure to do justice. The old Plural form heirs males appears in the year 1539. In p. 237 stands "it argueth your non-receipt of my letters;" here the substantive replaces the usual construction with the verb, a change that has done much harm in English since 1740.

There is the proverb, a good turn quickly done is twice done, p. 249 ; Elizabeth quotes, or rather misquotes, a saw of 1260, also known in Iceland ; when bale is lowest, boot is nearest, p. 280.

About this time appear the words aborigines, accoutrements ; the word achievement has been used down to our day for escutcheon ; but this is seen in Hall's Chronicle as hachemente, a curious instance of the loss of v. These items I take from Dr. Murray's Dictionary.

In Burgon's 'Life of Gresham' we see a substituted for he in Mrs. Quickly's style ; a can speak, p. 108. We read of a frame of tymbre, silk stockings ; a cargo is conveyed in one bottom (ship), p. 472 ; a man is open-mouthed. We read of Turkey carpets, a Bursse (Exchange), Spanish rials (reals), an Agentship (Gresham's own post), the interest money ; Gresham addresses the Council as your honnors, p. 98. He talks of the rate of interest after thirteen upon the hundred, p. 132 ; he then uses the new style, sixteen per cento, p. 92. English commerce was now beginning to make its mark in the world.

In Coverdale's 'Memorials' of this time we see that his predecessor at Exeter was known as Veyzy ; the name was also written Voyzy ; these two forms are in our day carefully distinguished. We find the new adjective lucky used as a synonym for prosperous, p. 238. We have long before seen thus much ; we now find this moch of it, p. 199. Coverdale speaks of the popular burdens of songs in his day, hey nony nony and hey trolly loly, p. 248. Among Romance words in this work are exactly, ratable, p. 107 ; commit to memory, subtract. Psalm-singing is called a godly sport in p. 104. The suffix ling is fastened to a Romance word in the scornful tenderling, p. 259. We see Latenyst, p. 197 ; but a scholar in Hellenic lore was always a Grecian. The name Protestant appears in English in 1542, but it refers as yet to the Germans only, p. 256 ; the form Austria has not yet replaced the old Ostericke. Latin words were coming into English ; we see et cetera at the end of a sentence, p. 258.

it to Cecil, an old schoolfellow of his. He is fond of the ie for the sound of French ê, writing bryed for breed, and many other such; the owmpere of 1440 appears as umpier, p. 22, leading to our form umpire. I may here remark that of late, owing to the favourite game of lawn tennis, we have turned this noun umpire into a verb. The old en is making way for in; there is intricate, p. 128. The t is added to round off a word; dott comes from dol (stultus). Among the Substantives kysel (keel) is revived after a very long sleep. We have seen aslope and slopeswise; we at last light upon the noun slope, p. 78. There is the phrase, the good wyfe of the house, p. 123, which seems strange at London. There is the new scolefellow, p. 16. We hear that "monsters are no newes," which is a novel phrase. Among the Adjectives are yonge bladed (grass), a smal eater. Orrmin's smikerr appears as smugge, p. 26, and is used in our scornful way; it is here coupled with smooth. Land had long been stony; but in p. 115 insensibility is called stonishe, a good example of the use of the scornful ish. Tyndale's a great many is altered in p. 65; thies good many yeares. The old substantive cheap is now made a regular adjective; to bie them verie chepe, p. 42; sumwhat cheper, p. 49; this Comparative is something new. There is a curious repetition of the old ân (unus) in p. 68, the one and onlye waye; in p. 161 Pride is called one only beast. In p. 70 the Utopians make strange devices theire owne (learn them). The nothing like appears in a new guise; nothing to be compared with them, p. 133. Among the Verbs are to hooke in the kynge, stand him in much money, p. 87. The digge in p. 102 is used as in the 'Apology for the Lollards' 150 years earlier; digge their mothers under the sides. The old be you sure is altered in p. 146 into you maye be suer that, etc. Our in and among have often been confused from the earliest times; in p. 26 men play the critic amonge their cuppes; hence the later in his cups. The Latin proprius governs the Dative; hence peculiar to you English, p. 40.

There is the verb flout from the Dutch fluyten (to jeer); this came from the French, and further from the Low Latin; in this curious pedigree flatus (breath) is the parent.

Among the Romance words are longitude, latitude, retain-our (servant), monopolie, gallymalfreye (mixture), dictionayre, chaumber pot, incidentlye (incidentally). The word pier in p. 34 seems to mean columna, which is new; pieres of realmes. In p. 128 the word gross is coupled with plain (simple), and is applied to the interpretation of laws. In one place in p. 135 basse is used as a synonym for the common people; in another place it is applied to bribery, and is a synonym for cowardly; here a change is at work. Slaves may be got for gramercye (gratis), p. 121. Jokes may be out of place, p. 52. In p. 98 stands the phrase, "this trade of traffique or marchaundise;" here the trade keeps its old sense of cursus, and traffique gets its present sense. In p. 144 men are entered (trained) in religion. We here see the very old forms awnter, hedlonges, the over (upper) end.

To this date belongs the word barton (farm-yard); see Dr. Murray.

Cavendish wrote his life of Cardinal Wolsey about 1555; I have here used Singer's edition. The ie is added to a word, as Countie Clermont (a nobleman), p. 88; hence Shakespere talks of the County Paris. There are the new substantives drum, tiltyard; we hear of the meat of an orange, the walks in a garden, of fine linen Holland cloth. In p. 202 stands lady masker, the first time, I think, that lady, in compounds with another noun, supplants the former Old English wife. Wolsey, in p. 255, says that he has nothing but the clothes on his back. The words morrow and morning, both alike here meaning the Latin mane, may be seen in one sentence, p. 387. As to Adjectives, in p. 84 we find wye (parvus), the Scotch wee; this puzzling word is quoted from More's writings. In p. 141 stands the dead time of the night; the time was to be dropped some years later. The word like takes a the before it; I never saw the like, p. 201. We have a full gallop; twenty years or more. There is the Numeral no one day (not a day), p. 286. Among the Verbs is the intransitive waffet, p. 251; boats waffet (sail or row), p. 251; this was soon to become waft, with a change of meaning.

There are the phrases sit on thorns, sell our lives dearly, broken English, he fired (fired up), take until next day, he is yielded, his eyes were set in his head (when near death). We had long used be in brewing; the Verbal noun, as usual, leads to the verb brew becoming intransitive; matters brew, p. 203. The verb call here gets the sense of awake; call him early, p. 324. In p. 381 stands the angry, what have you to do to ask, etc.; this to do (ado) was soon to give place to the synonym business; what business have you, etc. Wolsey fears, in p. 392, that God will leave us in our own hands; the Scotch say, he was so left to himself. Among the Adverbs are on! standing by itself, p. 106. As to Prepositions, there is have a jewel of him, p. 332; we should say in him; the with is now followed by a Past Participle, he never went with any part of divine service unsaid, p. 105.

Among the Romance words are confections, difficile, pier (of harbour), havresack, chess board, fife, a mutual brother, p. 333; hence our "mutual friend," so long objected to. The word compasses is used for stratagem, p. 78. The verb entertain in p. 165 expresses, not hospitality, but agreeable converse; it is applied to the meeting of the French king and Wolsey on horseback. A man plants himself near the king, p. 295; the verb had been making way within the last few years, being used of something besides trees and flowers. In p. 249 something is parcel gilt; in the next page parcel stands for package. In p. 299 Wolsey's servants are called his family; hence our family prayers. In p. 305 slander is used for the kindred scandal. In p. 347 Wolsey speaks with a faint voice, a new sense of the Adjective. The phrase be in trouble is used of a man imprisoned, p. 382; the noun here gets a very harsh sense. Cavendish borrows from his old master the adjective dulce, seen in p. 177. Ladies' dress is cut by tailors, p. 201. We hear of every several University, p. 205. There is the new directly, which followed the course of the English straight; it seems as yet to be used of place, not of time. In p. 248 stands grograine, whence came, centuries later, the word grog. A chair is based in a certain spot, p. 281. In p. 307 we hear of livery clothes; in p. 313 of liveries. Wolsey's servants, when asked to go to York, refuse to leave their native country; that is, Southern England, p. 307. A stag is coursed, p. 325. Wolsey lies barefaced in his coffin, p. 395; we now give a bad moral meaning to the word.

The Cardinal takes a nobleman's servants by the hands, whether gentlemen or yeomen, p. 362. Henry VIII. uses to Cavendish an oft-quoted speech, p. 399, "three may keep counsel, if two be away; if I thought that my cap knew my counsel, I would cast it into the fire." We hear that Henry VII., for his great wisdom, was known in every Christian region as "the second Solomon," pp. 78 and 216.

In Machyn's Diary (Camden Society), from 1550 to 1563, we see the word raw (crudus) pronounced much in the old way, for it is written roue, p. 304; but pryche (prædicare) shows that preach was losing its old sound. We find St. Olave's written Saynt Towllys, p. 21; hence the tailors of Tooley street. Abergavenny is cut down to Borgane, p. 45. The h in aliht (alight) is still sounded, for it is often written alykt. There is the phrase low water marke, p. 213. We see Rotland-shyre, p. 43; a sad corruption, too common in our day. A very old English Genitive idiom is kept in My Lord Dakurs of the North doythur (daughter), p. 29. In our time we talk of articles going off (being sold); something like this is found in p. 241, cheese went away for so much. Among the Romance words are obsequies, bellet (billet of wood), hurly burly (the Lancashire hourlé), marchand ventorer, change a blow or two. The old wait (watchman) now appears as a musician, p. 45; he had always sounded an alarm with some instrument. Bacon may be messelle (measly), p. 248. We read of an Englishman who was marchand of Muskovea in 1557, p. 166; Turkey merchants came later. The substantive sukett appears for dainty, p. 237; hence perhaps the sock so dear to Etonians. We hear of Hyde park corner, p. 55. The change of religion is marked in p. 249; in a London church a certain man was parson, and ys menyster. In the year 1561 a criminal is given to the barber surgeons

Richard Eden, the foremost pioneer of English researches in geography, translated many foreign works between 1553 and 1555 ; I have used Arber's Reprint. The author flourished at the moment when England was sending forth her own sons, both North and West, to make discoveries, and was no longer depending on foreigners like Cabot. Many a strange word, brought from America, is here made an English citizen. The books on America, compiled by Peter Martyr and Oviedo, were now first translated into English, as also were certain works on Russia. Columbus and Magellan were at last made known to the English public ; our own Chancellor and Drake were now in full vigour. As to Vowels, the e is sometimes added ; thus the old war (cautus) becomes ware, p. 386, our wary ; we see humane (mansuetus), p. 186, bearing a very different sense from human. The usual interchange of l and d is seen when Cadiz is written Cales in English. The p replaces f ; Coverdale's chaft now gives birth to chappes (fauces), p. 231 ; the other form chops had appeared in Dunbar ; the chappes in p. 16, from the Dutch kappen, express another meaning, scissura. The final d is clipped ; Barbour's shold appears as shole, our shoal. The c replaces h ; the old hoh gives birth to the Plural houx, our hocks, p. 292 ; it is here coupled with pasterns. The old crevis now simulates an English ending, and becomes crevyssh, p. 329, our cray fish.

Among the new Substantives are mainland, brode swoord, swoordeplayer, bludsucker, puff (mushroom), looking glass, man-hunter, woodpeck (woodpecker, p. 224), swoord fyshe, pack horse. Certain words bear new meanings, as the bed of a river, a neck of land ; beads are no longer connected with religion, but are given to savages, p. 251. The word dog now expresses masculus ; a dog tiger, p. 144. The word play now stands for hilaritas ; an animal is full of play, p. 171. The word fang expresses the Latin dens ; fanges or dogge teeth, p. 220. We hear of mariners' sloppes, p. 327 ; this old word for vestes seems henceforth to have been restricted to seamen. The very old byght (sinus) is revived in p. 380. We read of a hoommock (hillock), p. 381; this seems to come from hump. There is the Verbal noun swepynges (things swept), p. 157. The man is added to another Substantive; fyssher men are found in p. 189. The North stars are called charles wayne, p. 310. Job had already been connected with the morbus Gallicus as a kind of patron Saint; in p. 260 this plague is called the disease of saint Job. The Definite Article is inserted before the Verbal noun; something is worth the hearyng, p. 173. A phrase of Ascham's appears; the you is employed where man would have stood in Middle English; here you may get water, p. 381. Among the Verbs are a well meaning man, mouths water, break open a chest, set our course east; this course seems to be dropped in currents set to the eastward, p. 382; and also in to bear southwest, p. 379. Sailors reckon themselves to be in a certain spot, p. 381; hence their later reckonings. The verb flirt is seen for the first time, I think, in p. 23; nostrils flirt upward. There is the Scandinavian verb whiz, already used by Surrey, and the Celtic slabby (miry), p. 321, which must have had its influence on our sloppy.

As to the Romance terms, Eden thinks it well to prefix the interpretation of certain uncommon words in a table, p. 45; among these are colonie (an habitacion), paralleles, equinoctial (the Line), continente, here opposed to island; colonies are planted in p. 345. Peter Martyr made known many American words, such as canibal, canoa, maizium (maize), furacan (hurricane), botata (potato), p. 131, cocos (cocoa). Southern Asia gave us raia (rajah, p. 258); we now read of indigo and opium. From Tartary came hordas (hordes, turbæ), p. 291; Northern Europe gave us werst, mors (walrus), reen, p. 301, whence came reindeer; this had been known to the English in earlier days as hran. The Old German wisunt had produced the Latin bison; this now appears in England as bisom and bisont, pp. 292 and 305. We hear of Ginoia or Guinea, "which we call Gynne," p. 385; the Moors appear as negros, p. 384. We see iegot (gigot), insinuate, mortal enemy, to divine (guess), firm land, to perboyl, radical, bombasine, proo (prora), the confines, chestnut, sugar cane, fusion, mineral, picke of Teneriffe, p. 380, trunk of elephant, carat, buffe, whence came buffalo a hundred years later. The laundre of 1530 becomes laundress. There is the new phrase the state of thynges, p. 114. Soldiers are placed as pertisens about the General's person, p. 115; this word means a halberd; its later change of meaning and confusion with party is easy to be traced. The word quadrant had hitherto in England meant quadrangle; but henceforth, thanks to Peter Martyr and his translator, it stood for the instrument used at sea, p. 157. There is the strange Passive Participle sytuate, p. 187. Horses are not disembarked, but unbarked, p. 194. We have seen a General Captain, the last word is now dropped; and in p. 252 we read of a General. The verb muster seems to mean colligere, not ostendere as of old, p. 317. A man is abused with opprobrious words, p. 375; here the verb begins to slide into the new sense of vituperare; he is vilely used in p. 377. Sailors touch at a port, p. 379; a new employment of the verb. In p. 295 the varying Italian and English forms of one old Aryan word stand side by side; the axes (axis) or axceltree of the worlde. A whirlwind was called by the Greeks a tiphon, as we are told in p. 81; but our later typhoon is a Chinese word; the coincidence is rather strange. The drinking glasses "of Venice woorke" were highly esteemed in the East, p. 257.

I may remark the following old words and forms still lingering on, woodwale (woodpecker), slead (sledge), nevvy (nepos), olifant, to harborow. We have Luxburne for Lisboa, Lisbon, p. 378; here x expresses s in England almost for the last time.

Eden, in a later letter of 1561, p. xli., uses the French verb trawl, speaking of the fisheries; he here draws a wide distinction between Astrologers and Astronomers; the latter had come to the front, owing to the long voyages now undertaken.

There are many documents of the years 1554 and 1555 in Tytler's Edward VI., vol. ii. The French chateau is still pronounced shatewe by the English, p. 448; and the Pope of the time appears as July, p. 480. We had long talked of fair words, where the adjective means facilis or lenis; a man wishes in p. 469 to pass fair through a country; hence a fair passage. Fatigue lays men up; Charles V. shows himself at a feast; a youth is asked how he has his health. A man, when wanted, must not be out of the way, p. 452. The former wait for leads to stay for a wind, p. 410; there is much to his regret in p. 458. The Romance words are, the constitution of his body, p. 456; an authority for news, p. 464; be neuter in a dispute. A mother sends her most natural blessing to her son, p. 473. Charles V. praises douceur in Governors, and the English envoy leaves the word untranslated, p. 465.

In 1557 Udall's victim, Tusser, brought out his 'Hundred good points of husbandry' (English Dialect Society) in flowing anapæsts; a most popular work. He turns pelf into a verb by adding r, as pilfre, p. 224. The old Janiver and the new January are found in one stanza, p. 228. We see July with the accent on the first syllable, p. 231. There are the new substantives shed, sterveling, and dalop (dollop); day stands for victoria; get the daye, p. 232. In p. 220 there is the continuation of an old idiom, my serving you did cause, etc.; here the second word must be a Verbal noun. Among the Verbs are ring pigs, stub out thorns, get beforehand (in work). There is the Dutch verb dable, p. 224, (make wet and dirty); Shakespere's "dabbled in blood." Among the Romance words are tumbrel, compound with him, and the curious raskabilia (rogues). The old word Paske (Easter) appears in p. 228. There is the proverb in p. 233—

"A bushel of Marche dust, worth raunsomes of gold."

In p. 234 are twelve long lines, containing words all beginning with t or th—

"Things thriftie that teacheth thee thriving to thrive."

England had not yet bidden farewell to her old and beloved Alliteration. About this time allow took the new sense of permit, and the old alphin of the chessboard was replaced by the bishop. See Dr. Murray's Dictionary.

In 1558 Knox brought out at Geneva his unlucky book against the monstrous regiment of Women (Arber's Reprint). Some English friend must have corrected the manuscript for the press, for the language here is most unlike the Reformer's usual broad Scotch; certain letters of his have been added to the treatise. The au still expresses the French ou, for Friaul stands for Friuli, p. 14. Like a true Scot, Knox talks of the Ile of greate Brittanny, p. 3. The Queen's title hings on her birth, p. 59; I suspect that this old Northern form of hang had some influence on the later verb hinge. Knox lays his accompt as to what his book may cost him, p. 8. We have seen upon honour; men are now charged upon their allegiance, p. 42. We see corporal punishment, explain himself, the question is, if, etc. The Baptist was beheaded for the liberty of his tonge, p. 7; hence our take liberties. In p. 8 politike means sapiens, in p. 43 it means civilis. The word journey expresses pugna, p. 42. Knox applies the word monster in p. 50 to a woman ruling over men, this being something unnatural; in p. 45 Mary Tudor is called a cruell monstre. He applies the word base to English martyrs who were not of noble blood, p. 52. He follows Pope Clement VII. in branding the odious nation of Spaniards as Jews, p. 46.

I now begin Foxe's Book of Martyrs (Cattley's edition); it has had much influence on our speech. The e replaces a, as kennel for the old canal, i. 273; it replaces o, as sheet-anchor for Tyndale's shot-anchor, vi. 387; the very unusual æ reappears, as Ælmer (Bishop Aylmer), viii. 679. The i replaces æ, as he bid (jussit); also e, as in the proper name Allin (Allen). Both lust and list are found for voluptas. The o replaces e, as landloper for the old landleper. The oi for u is still found, as croysies (crusaders), iii. 53; also oi for i, as spoil blood (fundere), v. 299; the ou stands for i; they would him to (do it), viii. 81. The ou replaces o; the osel (merula) of 1430 now becomes ousel. We hear of Petow (Peto), the Bishop elect, viii. 636.

As to Consonants, we find pick used for pitch (torquere), viii. 629; also the two forms Goodrick and Goodrich for the name of the Bishop of Ely. The k is added to a word; the old chine becomes chink (of door). The k is prefixed; the old wandrethe (turbatio) becomes quandary. Bradford, a Lancashire man, uses both snag and snatch, vii. 232. A man is not egged, but edged, ii. 542. There is the Welsh Aparry, leading to Parry. We see the name Mildman, leading to Milman; the d is further struck out in gossopry (gossipred). The t is added, for rampire becomes rampart. The n is struck out; sprenge (sarmentum) becomes sprig, viii. 694. The l replaces r, as huddle for the old verb hoder. The r is added, for the old verb braid becomes broider, ii. 160; this we saw a few years earlier. The s is prefixed; the old cwysan becomes squeeze, iv. 115; here the French es or ex had influence. The s is inserted in gallowses, vi. 549.

Among the new Substantives are bunch of keys, deed-doer, nunnishness, the Pope's man (his candidate), a Cambridge man (student), a Scripture man, at arms' length, glut (turba, ii. 796), a hurry, book-maker (writer), gun stones (cannon balls), fatherliness, dog-days, Bluebeard, God's ape (imitator), breathing time, seat (of saddle), Jewishness, stamps (types), molehill, foreman (of jury), towndweller, the bench (magistrates), rush (impetus), stander by, wolfishness, outthruster, brickbat, wine-drawer, a man of great reading, fopperies (follies), coal hole, sideman (churchwarden), slaughter-slave, walking-staff, time out of mind, padlock, twopence-halfpenny, cart's tail, at the first chop, at the first dash (impetus), fire side, a downhill, stake-fellow, milkmaid, wonderment, self-murder, brand of infamy, our printing days (when printing is used), a deal more strictly, it was his doing, a doctrine of no ancient standing, goodwife Fisher, goodman Austen, the glance of a stroke, Allhalloweven, a great piece of money in my way (for my profit), seek all holes and corners, in his full cups, driven from house and home. Dunbar's clown has now made its way to London, iv. 365. The form depth had long been in use; but Ridley, wishing to express the cunning of Satan, revives the old deepness, vii. 422. The word heap is no longer confined to something concrete, heaps of joy, viii. 627. The word ring leader is used in a good sense, i. 259. The word shoal may now be used of men as well as of fish, i. 272. The word boatswain is still employed for a common sailor, ii. 247. The word sweepstake is used in the Neuter Gender, as equivalent to havoc, iii. 362. The word nap still bears its old exalted sense, for taking a nap is used of sleeping with Christ, viii. 172. The word odds gets a new meaning, that of disparity, ii. 771. The word imp had hitherto been employed most honourably, and is applied to Edward VI. in vi. 350; but in iv. 75 we see young imps of this impious generation; and in v. 640 imp of Satan. Foxe wishes that More had kept himself in his own shop (profession), iv. 652; hence our "talk shop." We find packing in connexion with a jury, iv. 204. We hear of bands employed in Wishart's dress, and connected with his shirt, v. 626. The word shroud seems to lose the old sense of vestis, and to be connected with burial, vii. 548; it was worn by Latimer at the stake. Foxe, like former writers, speaks of swearers as tearers of God, viii. 641. He coins hand-book from manual, ii. 29; but this had been coined once before, prior to the Conquest. The old tunmon is revived as townsman; and the old lore reappears in the South after a long sleep. He is fond of the suffix ling, as popeling, Bonnerling. The word jill is used as an abusive epithet, applied to the Lady Elizabeth, and giving rise to a long dispute, viii. 623. We know "Jack in office;" Foxe talks of John out of office, p. 663. A writing is said to have neither head nor foot (tail), v. 479. Bradford, in the year 1555, seems to have first used the favourite pun of bitesheep for bishop, vii. 248. We hear of the toll-booth (prison) at Cambridge, viii. 285. The name Dennis may be borne by a woman, p. 640. The descriptive word spinster is now used after a proper name, as Rose Allin, spinster, viii. 306. On the other hand, widow is used as a prefix, Widow Swaine, p. 599. We see the Suffolk name Dowsing, p. 424, a name terrible to the lovers of architecture ninety years later. Other feelings are called up by the name Thomasin à Wood, p. 377. There is the odd phrase in p. 627 (her hopes) all came to a castle-come-down; we have already seen castles in Spain. The word jug is seen, p. 42; Mr. Skeat derives it from Judith, a pet name for a pitcher. A new word, hastler, seems to have been coined in Queen Mary's time; Foxe explains it as one who makes and hastens the fire for the martyrs, p. 426. Cranmer falls in a stand, p. 42; hence our "come to a stand." We find Agnes Glascock written Mistress A. Glascock to suit a rime, p. 195; it is the earliest instance, I think, of one letter doing duty for an English Christian name. We have seen the franchise of London; Foxe writes of the freedom of Ayr, p. 443; speaking of a district. In p. 465 a man asks further day; this word and law seem to be synonyms in more than one instance. A tradesman talks of this bill of my hand, p. 473; hence our note of hand. We see the original of coping stone in p. 514, a man wears a coping tank (head covering); this comes from the old cop.

Among the Adjectives are a sparing man, a mighty rage, cockish (our cocky), in free prison, beetle-headed, chuff-headed (hence our chuck-headed), brazen-faced, quick with child. Foxe is fond of coining new adjectives by adding like to a substantive, as truthlike, Gospel-like, hosteler-like, doctorly, sightly. He is the first, I think, to use stingy (parcus), i. 269. The old true still means honestus; get a penny truly, viii. 498. We see hither treated like further and made an Adjective, the hither bank, p. 568. The word untidy is used of ground that produces weeds, iv. 121; it is also applied to arguments (slovenly), viii. 234. The sweet is prefixed to Saints' names, by sweet St. Peter, ii. 527. There is a curious Superlative, the pickedst (choicest) things, i. 332. A substantive is prefixed to an Adjective where a Preposition is understood, as knee-deep, ii. 177. The white appears once more for favourite; the Pope's own white son, ii. 190. Orrmin's old sheepish now gets the new sense of stultus, iv. 51. What we call a lame excuse appears as a blind excuse, iv. 613. In the same page we read of a good debt (likely to be discharged). The word better stands for more; we desire no better, i. 308. In vii. 316 we must take earthly things for no better than they be. A mother, when bearing a child, may have a good time, vi. 710. The word manly stands for humanus, v. 372. Barbour's like (likely) has now come South; like enough (probable) stands in p. 489; Bradford says that a man had like to have been slain, vii. 161. The homely becomes further degraded, and stands for crudelis, vi. 695. A woman looks bleak (pallida), viii. 221; persecutors look black in the mouth, p. 617. Something cost a hundred pounds thick (a solid sum), p. 260. We hear of fine (good) writers; a fine fellow. The adjective is now employed as a kind of parenthesis, "unto whom, good man, he submitted," vi. 657. Cranmer is said to be the very middle man of all the martyrs, viii. 90; half being burnt before, half after him. A parish in Essex is called in one and the same page, 142, Much Burstead and Great Burstead; Essex certainly belongs to the South. There is the old Northern phrase whole as a fish, p. 673.

As to Pronouns, there is something new in I have discovered mine, yours, and England's enemies, viii. 675. The my is now dropped before a title of honour; we see Lady Bartlet, viii. 581. Foxe well marks the contrast between the mild Bishop of Chichester and the savage Story when they are examining a martyr; the first addresses him with you, the latter with thou, viii. 341. The rightful Dative, well was him, is changed; well was he that could, etc., iv. 581. The it or they may be dropped, words as plain as can be, viii. 587. The it has a backward reference; a man, frightened in his sleep, thinks that he shall never recover it, ii. 533. This it may be substituted for there; what tongue is it that she knoweth not? viii. 602. The what is used for aliquid, one of its oldest senses; wot you what, says Henry VIII., in v. 690; hence Shakespere's "I tell you what." The old such like makes way for such kind of things, iv. 619. There is the phrase to all their comforts (to the comfort of them all), viii. 620. The Latin omnia mea is imitated in my all, i. 287. The all has a backward reference, do it for none of them all, viii. 460; men suffer all because they would not stoop, iv. 106. We see I can say none otherwise, and also no otherwise, in viii. 360. Gardiner seemed nobody in Scripture knowledge, p. 587; a new phrase. A king in ii. 283 claims to be his own man (act for himself). It is their own fault stands in viii. 125. A monarch is ready enough and too much to gratify the clergy, iii. 228. Men are all in a tale, viii. 42, Dogberry's future phrase; here the a is clearly used for one. There is the new phrase any one diocese, viii. 344. The Numerals appear in Plural forms; men are killed by two and threes, ii. 574. There is the curious idiom for your two sakes, viii. 186. The phrase a twelvemonth had long been known; we now find one twelvenpence, p. 473. Bradford says that half a suspicion was in him; that is, he half suspected, vii. 259. Gardiner makes a half turn to the Gospel, p. 587. The every whit is sometimes changed; he lost the money every groat, viii. 473.

Among the Verbs are give check to, fall in with (meet), make up to him, put in practice, fall out (accidere), break the neck of disturbance, let fall (drop), cut up meat, take sides, lay a train (dolus), go against him (displease), hold out, talk over the matter, smell a rat, ii. 466, a spread eagle, come what would, a book came out, take up the matter, cut his comb, keep in with them, go (agree) with the Pope, make short work with, fly in my face, keep him in play, lead by the nose, go to print (press), stand in force, things hang together (concur), it came unto him to speak, give my guess, I take it to signify, make battle, feed his wars, go the right way to work, miscall (vituperare), the beaten way, not know which way to turn him, have words with (a conference), quicken (look alive), unsay, play fast or loose with, turn head to tail (alter his opinions), cut out words (in a parchment), come in question, send it packing, unhouse, warn him out of his house, fetch (bring) it about, let the matter sleep, have (know) Latin, if it were to do again, fall to it (begin the attack), give cause, tire him out, take to his legs (Palsgrave had here inserted him), take exceptions against, keep a stir, come forward (get on in life), fish for things, to lord it, break the ice, to fleece, keep order, unbishoped (deprived of see), stand to their tackle, he will have the last word, look big, I can tell you, vii. 667; I will be hanged if, etc., mar your own market, call him opprobrious names (here we drop the Adjective), take a note of it, make the best of it, be put to it (compelled), tied to time, take depositions, give out (proclaim), meddle or make, eat your words, skim over it, take in men (decipere, viii. 536), make an escape, untaken, take their names, blow hot and cold, take place (succeed), to do it was death, make his appearance, what do you make of it, have a good opinion of, follow the camp, make a lane (passage), go to the worst (bad, viii. 662). There is a new Verb tinkle, formed from the sound. A new form of the old gird (ferire) appears in jerk, i. 208, retaining as yet the same meaning. The old pulten (trudere) is now found with a slightly altered sense and form; pelt with stones, ii. 452. In iii. 367 we hear of the fetching (dolosus) practice of Prelates; the meaning of the word is rather altered in the slang of our day. The old scrape gives birth to a new verb scramble, v. 459. The sloor (cænum) of the 'Promptorium' gives birth to slorry (fœdare), viii. 172; hence our slur. The old verb leardian (trifle) seemed to have vanished; but in p. 485 Bonner flirts a martyr under the chin with a stick. In i. 341 Rome takes head above other churches; hence our to make head, or take rank. The phrase blow up (evertere) is used without reference to gunpowder; a storm blows up houses and trees, ii. 376. We had long used fall out (certare); to this, in iii. 416, is opposed fall in with (agree); so soldiers are ordered to fall in; that is, keep a uniform line. The verb miss takes a new sense; a man misses (leaves out) certain words, viii. 493. The verb cross is used first for adversari; to cross men, vi. 608; also for transire; cross the sea, viii. 713. Henry the Eighth's verb scale gains a fresh meaning; skin scales off, viii. 328. There is a new use of shut up, a favourite phrase in our day; I have shut up your lips with your own book, viii. 216. The verb toll (trahere) is now first used in connexion with bells, vii. 439. The verb come is used without implying any physical motion; he came to understand that, etc., viii. 327; "arrive at the knowledge." We have seen fetch a compass; we have now fetch a leap, vii. 604; Bunyan's Apollyon "fetches a blow." There is the vile compound disclothe. A penitent keeps his measures at the Confiteor, viii. 206; that is, "goes through the customary duty;" our "keep no measure with" suggests transgressing all custom. A priest shows up (elevates) the Host, p. 214; our use of the verb is very different. The verb leave off had hitherto governed a Participle; we now see leave off shoes, ii. 351. A martyr is asked to come into one church with the Bishops, vi. 597; hence "come into the scheme." Bradford speaks of worthiness, and then adds, Worthiness, quoth I? (do I say?), vii. 265. The verb I lay is dropped in betting sentences; twenty pounds, it is a man, viii. 539. Foxe mistakes the old wolde nolde, and writes wil'd she, nil'd she, p. 556. When a man offers to take his death upon a certain thing, p. 611, we see how take a bet arose. The get you had hitherto been followed by an Adverb; we now see get you gone, viii. 595. Foxe is fond of the phrase have him by the back; hence the later "have him on the hip." In viii. 622 there is a plot to take the Queen out of the way (kill her); this is the later take off; the Irish conspirators of 1882 used the more polite remove. Queen Mary yields life to nature, p. 624 (pays the debt of nature). Some people, beggared and ruined, are left to the wide world in their clothes, viii. 630. The old Future is very plain in the phrase candles you get none, vii. 667. The old shall gives way to must, in you must understand that, etc., iv. 593. Ridley employs would in the Northern sense; I think that he would not say so (cannot have said so), vi. 487. There is a curious instance of the development of the Passive voice in viii. 318, no testaments durst be brought; also, in p. 601, men were deprived of their lands, for him to be inducted. A Participial phrase may be greatly enlarged; a-not-enough-circumcised heart, vi. 635. A noun is prefixed to the Past Participle, as stall fed, vii. 232. We have seen that niman once meant videre as well as capere; a man now takes down a lane when flying, viii. 337. The bear governs a Passive Infinitive, bear to be admonished, v. 135. There is the cry stop! stop! viii. 320. We find a new use of the Accusative after the Verb in to live the Gospel, vii. 197. The was is dropped before need; more ado than needed, viii. 6. The word tumble now becomes transitive, tumble my bed, v. 424. We have seen Barbour's put him to sea; the Accusative is now dropped; put from the shore, vii. 369. The verb whip takes a new meaning; whip on my clothes, viii. 336. There is a curious phrase in vii. 147, a man shifts himself with a clean shirt; here two different meanings of the verb seem to be mixed together. The phrase look for adds the meaning of querere to that of expectare, viii. 6. The verb yelp is now confused with the old galpen of 1360, and means clamare, viii. 89; it ceases to bear its old sense gloriarī. The old spruten (pullulare), used of trees, is now applied to blood, and the letters are transposed; blood spirts out, viii. 578. An unlearned assistant sets a priest, p. 610; that is, baffles or puts him out; this new sense is still known in the hunting field. The verb want certainly expresses desiderare in p. 688; hereunto we want indifferent using (fair treatment).

As to Adverbs, Foxe compounds them in the old English way by adding like or ly to a noun; as school-like (scholasticē), i. 49, bishoplīke, Christianly, flatly; the ly is added to Past Participles, as groundedly instructed, iv. 384. Nothing plainer marks the change in the use of cheap, than that the Adverb cheaply should be found, iv. 445. There is the negative nay sure, viii. 355, which may still be heard. There is a new use of however; it is found in the middle of a sentence by itself, and stands for tamen, v. 369. Foxe uses while in the Northern sense of until in vi. 717. The well is used for naturally; displeased, as he might full well (be), ii. 161. The together is added after nouns; Chaucer and Gower were great friends together, iv. 249. Latimer runs as fast as his old bones would carry him, vi. 534. There is out of heart; a beard is on, vi. 718; see the game out, p. 615; the wind is up, p. 379. A person speaks thick, vi. 700. Bonner offers a man fair, vii. 356. We say that a man is good all round; the phrase used by Foxe is on every side a man, vii. 97. Ridley uses forth much in its old sense, equivalent to far (procul); forth of the Church is no salvation, vii. 412. A woman, being asked her age, answers, forty and upwards, viii. 537. There is ever anon, p. 550; we insert and between these words.

The old overthwart makes way for the Scotch athwart; athwart the face, ii. 189. The use of under, in the sense of less than, is extended; a prelate never rides under fifteen hundred horse, ii. 311. Gardiner plays under the board, v. 526; we say, fair and above board; above the board stands in vi. 703. There is at no hand (by no means), viii. 612, which leads to our "at first hand." We see the phrases, by halves, a king at arms (herald), out of use, to my knowledge; the in is used to compound, as the verb imbox, ii. 715. Something happens, and is followed by another circumstance, upon the neck of this, ii. 435; this neck had appeared in Ascham. There is upon a sudden, v. 264, meaning, I suppose, on or in a sudden time. Cranmer, seeing King Edward's learning, declares that he never thought that to have been in him, v. 700. The over supplants for in compounding, as overwatch himself, vi. 57. The old endlang is altered; certain chests are set on end, p. 283. A man does not come up with a fugitive, but comes in with him, p. 337. The toward is coupled with Numerals and is used of time; a person is well toward (on to) a hundred (years), p. 553. A curious instance of a Preposition being dropped is, shoot the bridge, p. 609; here through disappears.

Bonner's oath, by my troth, is objected to by one of the martyrs, vii. 355; the Bishop also swears, by All-hallows, viii. 407. Mocking laughter is represented by hough, hough, 352.

The words akin to or derived from the Dutch and German are furlough, jeer, buoy.

The Scandinavian words are paltry, to bilge (of a ship), pad (bundle), billow. Bonner calls a man "a stout boyly heretic;" this may be bully, coming from bullra (clamare).

Among the Romance words are manage, bad economy, give mate to, initiate into, public house (church), schoolfellow, carry pick-back, i. 30, ulcer, unique, i. 261, impoverish, pre-ordain, to stomach, reiterate, to unpope, to unpriest, to dispriest, press him to pay, story-book, concertation, encroach (seize upon), aggravate (oppress), cream (chrism), appeal him up, landing place, sequel, harpy, feastful day (festival), expunge (root out), exasperate, expostulate, debase, revolt, repulse, evacuate (quash), belabour, monied man, principal (of money), innovate, escort, larum bell, disfavourer, preposterous, to articulate matters, bail

The word dictate means to "set up for master," i. 200. The verb point, ii. 373, gets the new meaning of placing stops in a sentence. The word stress, as distinguished from distress, is now confined to the weather, ii. 316. The old ride in post is now shortened into to post. There is the new phrase, offer contumely (offer an insult), ii. 276. The word face now expresses impudence; have the face to write, ii. 476. The word manure changes and takes its modern sense of stercus; horse-manure, iv. 533. Tyndale had talked of canvassing (examining) a man; Foxe writes of canvassing voters, iv. 601. He has Ascham's word antics, v. 4, meaning apparently curiously carved bosses; he adds to this sense (it had already appeared in Hall), the new sense of freaks, iv. 665; for he speaks of More's antics as a writer. The verb ply adds the sense of occupare to its old meaning flectere, v. 24. There is a new sense of ordinary in, p. 115 ; a gentleman keeps a good ordinary at his table ; that is, welcomes every one. The old courtezan now takes the sense of meretrix, p. 137. Gardiner was an organ of Satan, p. 258 ; a new sense of the word. Cromwell was touched when he read the Scriptures, p. 365. Henry VIII. says that his nature (disposition) is always to pardon, p. 691. A man may now be pledged, when you drink to him, p. 493. The verb prejudice takes a new meaning, vi. 550, which we express by pre-judge. In p. 613 state is opposed to church. Memories are present (good), p. 664 ; this afterwards led to presence of mind. The verb pretend now means proponere ; pretend an oath against a man, vii. 159. Barclay had used promoter for a lawyer ; Foxe constantly uses the word to signify an informer, and this last word is also employed. Latimer was hindered from his duty-doing, vii. 455 ; hence a parson takes duty. The word posy, the old poesy, is often used of prose mottoes, as in pp. 517 and 549. Scurrilous Protestants used to call the Host round Robin, p. 523 ; we apply the phrase to petitions. Gardiner casts a platform to build his popery upon, p. 592 ; this we saw a few years earlier. A certain martyr has an evil mess of handling, p. 719 ; this may have influenced our "get into a mess." The word glorious takes the bad meaning of boastful. So evil a sense had varlet taken during its forty years of existence in our land that Cranmer is praised for never using the word to the meanest of his servants, viii. 19. The word royalties gets a new meaning, that of revenues, p. 20. There is a curious instance of the twofold sense of pitiful, p. 67 ; Cranmer says that Queen Mary's pitiful ears will hear pitiful complaints. We are told in p. 289 that inhumanity is a far gentler term than cruelty ; this we have certainly changed. The term imbecility is applied to the natural weakness of women, p. 326. The word check is transferred from the chess board to common life ; a man hung has a great check with the halter, p. 396. Priests post fast when saying the mass, p. 476. The word sensible gets the meaning of sapiens (Bonner), p. 477. The verb broil is used as something worse than burn, p. 492.

The word descry is used for informing against, p. 523 ; something like discover. The adjective insolent loses its old meaning and stands for insulting, p. 531. The word faculty begins to take a Plural sense ; you and all the faculty (turba) of you, p. 564. The adjective plain is opposed to adorned, p. 565 ; it is here used of beads ; we apply it to women. Ladies flourish in their bravery (fine clothes), p. 604 ; we still talk of flourishing about. Foxe brings in many Latin and Greek words without alteration, as opprobrium, bona fide, panacea, halcyon, proviso, de facto, a fortiori, a priori, cry peccavi, ii. 719, verbatim, parenthesis, interim, a non sequitur, chimera, ipso facto, apoplexia, ex officio, symptomata, exterior, in fine. He writes in Greek characters apotheosis ; see also vii. 621. The baptim of Tyndale's day is now laid aside for baptism, and his ear shrift now becomes auricular confession. The old A B C and the new alphabet are both used, vii. 209, 226. The word race, coming from various sources, was already well known ; Foxe uses the word in the sense of genus, a new French sense, p. 269. We have seen Parson Tully ; we now find Justice Gaudy, p. 118. Foxe often employs party for homo. He is very fond of using sycophant for calumniator ; he has the neuter decorum, much as we use it. A fat man is called a grand paunch, v. 459 ; something like slow belly. Ridley, at his death, gives away his dial (watch), vii. 549. The verb profess (promise) now governs the Infinitive ; profess to visit Palestine, ii. 278 ; there is profess the Gospel, viii. 473. Bonner, on being reproved for swearing, answers with much truth, I am no saint, vii. 355. Even the Roman champion, Harpsfield, talks of the Sabbath (Sunday), p. 651. Law and equity are combined, as if in contrast, p. 693. We had long had forget himself ; in iv. 616 stands remember himself. The verb double is now used for decipere, iv. 609. Foxe compounds suitlike to, iv. 601, which was to become suitable a few years later. We see promptness, which was later to be turned into promptitude. We hear of the Vice in a play, a byword for folly, vii. 544. We find popular used for the adjective commonplace, iii. 373, referring to the events in a chronicle. In p. 377 moderator is used for con- troller; hence the office in the Scotch Kirk. The close is used for the Cathedral clergy, iv. 126. A cook refuses to execute a lord's command, with pardon me, viii. 612. In viii. 102 the word freemason is still used of a trade; there was no idea of any secret society connected with the word until the next Century. The word malignant is sometimes applied to the enemies of God; this use of the term was to be in great vogue ninety years later. The phrase bible-babble had come in earlier; it is once used to a martyr who wishes to quote the Bible, viii. 340. The word circumstance is used for a roundabout way of stating a case, p. 168. Foxe says that priestlike garments were called habits, p. 267. The word court is now made a verb; to court preferment (desire it), p. 271; in courting a lady the sense afterwards became stronger. A master now talks of his pupil, p. 271; rather earlier it had been his scholar. The Latin cassare (discharge) leads to cashing a soldier, p. 288; here he leaves the camp with his wages; the German cashier was to come later. Men do something, every man in his turn, a new phrase, p. 268; this had been formerly for his turn. The verb peel now becomes intransitive; skin peels off, p. 328. A sum of money appears as a piece of money, p. 473; in p. 560 we hear of a piece of providence, like our piece of good luck. Eden's new word canibal, derived from Carib, stands in viii. 482; it is here applied to Bonner. There is the Italian verb, to solfa, ii. 279; the old plætza of the year 1000 appears here as piazza. We see Monsieur le Pope, who is also called a caliph, ii. 294. Foxe talks of the Swiss pages or cantons, iv. 335. There is Sultan, Mussulman (wrongly stated to be a Turkish priest), iv. 86. Both Termagant and Mahound are used for a Mussulman, iii. 359. Foxe uses Romish Catholic, also Catholic, iii. 350, the Pope's sect, Romanist, iv. 473, papist; he calls certain doctors "great Rabbins." He speaks of the black guard of the Dominics (black friars), iv. 169; the phrase is also found in Grafton's Chronicle. He talks with scorn of psalm-saying friars, viii. 84; hence our psalmsinging. The word gentility is used for heathenism in i. 309. Bonner wishes to reclaim two men to his faction and fashion, vi. 730; a curious instance of the old Latin word and its French corruption side by side. The origin of our carte blanche appears when Richard II. sends out blank charts, iii. 219. Foxe complains of something being blanch stuff, i. 278; hence our "sad stuff." Certain men are cousins-germans removed, ii. 93, which leads to a well-known phrase of ours. Edward I. is called a fierce young gentleman, ii. 551. Latimer's arguments are exhibited up, vi. 501; hence our boys show up verses. The word infidel stands for Pagan, vii. 168. The word Christian is employed for a pious man; Cobham is called the Christian knight, iii. 322; religion is used for Protestantism, viii. 41, a well-known French usage. Foxe brings back quarrel to its old sense querela in viii. 7, where the mild Cranmer quarrels with his friends for promoting him. The word desperate is much used; the desperates stand in iv. 620. Queen Mary's expected babe is called this young master, vii. 125. The word master is used as of old in fresh compounds, as master-cowl (chief cowl), ii. 52. The word train is now connected with gunpowder, iv. 59. Latimer uses politic and civil as meaning the same, vii. 416. Foxe, following his countryman Manning, uses the rare word enamoured, viii. 72.

Among old English words and forms used by Foxe are fore-elders, spill a body (perdere, i. 261), overlive him, as ye ween, to housel, his evil willers, well-willers, soul health, Everik (York, ii. 255), to forslack, spar (claudere), lin (cessare), namely (præcipué), to wreak them of, witch (warlock), make (conjux), morrow-mass, loadsmán (dux), to gainstand, wanhope, ruth, have no nay (denial), middle-earth, brim (ferus), lese (perdere), otherwhile, market-stead, inchmeal, spur (rogare), dere (lædere, iv. 200), rock (colus), the five Wits (senses), to kemp, dizard (stultus), some deal (somewhat), glaver (blan-diri), braid (impetus), he can (scit) grammar, a youngling, be crazed (ill). There is the old idiom the prætor's daughter of that city, iv. 81; also ride or go (walk). Among old words and forms, non-Teutonic, we find titiviller (mischief-maker), spouse-breach, take travail, goods and cattle (chattels), rascal (common) soldier, scurrier (scout), achates, a stroy-good (destroyer of property), it forceth not (it matters), augrim

(arithmetic), I am well apaid, a many (turba). The word knour (nodus), still in Northern use, is employed by a Lancashire man, vii. 68. His countryman Bradford uses buskle, the Northern busk (parare), vii. 203; also weal (divitiæ). The Kentish office of bors-holder appears; the word is still in use. A Devonshire woman is called a mazed creature, viii. 499; the term is not obsolete. The word harborous had so slipped out of use that Foxe has to explain it, viii. 20. A very favourite metre, about 1550, was the one afterwards used by Lord Macaulay in his 'Virginia;' there is a long specimen in vii. 356; this metre dates from the Twelfth Century. The poet here uses yelad, doubtless in imitation of Chaucer. Thomas Aquinas appears as Thomas of Watring, i. 107. Foxe draws a broad distinction between Briton and Englishman, i. 258, and tells us that the Saxons spoke English, p. 347. He derives lurdane from Lord Dane, ii. 76. He tells us that the Dutch tongue was spoken at Ostend, viii. 664. His use of the word boor (agrestis, ii. 452) is a memorial of his sojourn in what he calls Dutchland, as also is his horror of the Turks. His idea of king craft is peculiar; for the many rebellions crushed by Edward VI. are reckoned among the boy's glories, viii. 627. A gentleman's son, in those days, might be sent to London as an apprentice, viii. 473. The dialogue in viii. 322 shows how humble a chaplain had to be to his patron. Foxe declares that Elizabeth had a marvellous meek stomach, p. 604; she altered rather later. The Tudor arms in churches are referred to in viii. 56, "down with the arms of Christ, and up with a lion and a dog!" The word Lollardy was still in use in 1557, viii. 261. Foxe complains that the Popes hold Rome from its lawful Emperor, a continual treason, iii. 380. English pronunciation of Latin at this time could not have differed much from that used in Germany; see viii. 575. Foxe has a full belief in Prester John, iv. 91, whom he quarters in Africa. The Italians, it is remarked, do not lightly praise those who are not their countrymen, viii. 604; Milton confirms this. We have a fine example of Spanish courtesy, where Philip makes the Lady Elizabeth such an obeisance that his knee touched the ground, p. 623. Foxe couples players with printers and preachers as God's bulwark against the Pope, vi. 57. One pious martyr is specially let out of prison to play in the Coventry pageant, in Mary's time, viii. 170. Bonner, threatening to have a man hanged, says that he will make twelve godfathers to go upon him, vii. 409; the phrase was later applied to Shylock. Bonner refuses the title of master to a heretic, Master Green, p. 740. We see some of the earliest germs of Puritanism in p. 70, where a martyr talks of Paul's church (so called) and of Christ's day (Easter day); our Lady's chapel is also objected to, viii. 586; Tyndale had not gone so far as this. A heretic might be known by his use of the phrases, the Lord, we praise God, the living God, the Lord be praised, viii. 341. Old Testament names came in; one of the heretics has his child christened Josue, p. 434. A bishop, with them, became a superintendent, p. 540. Foxe gives us the proverbs, to stop two gaps with one bush (kill two birds with one stone), iv. 199; man purposeth one thing, and God disposeth another, p. 608; neither time nor tide is to be delayed, viii. 608. There is the phrase, is the wind in that corner? viii. 205; Gardiner, threatening to rack a man, says, "I will make thee a foot longer," p. 584. A heretic makes the pun that she will not swim in the see of Rome, p. 391. St. Nicholas' clerks (thieves) are mentioned in p. 579. Foxe is the first English writer, I think, who added notes to his text.

In Arber's 'English Garner,' i., iv., and v., may be found certain narratives, among others those of Underhill's imprisonment and Hawkins' voyages, pieces ranging between 1558 and 1570. We see the on once more cut down to a, as astern and ashore. We hear of Scio and Leghorn; the last is a curious change from Livorno. There are the new Substantives house-room, the leeward, the windwards, soundings. The word firework stands for a warlike engine, used to defend Calais, iv. 198. The word mound (defence) is revived after a long sleep, iv. 198; it may afterwards have been confused with mount. The word breach is used in connexion with walls. A man is said to be a plague to others, p. 119. We hear of the main (mainland) of Cuba, p. 120; hence the later Spanish Main. The word bed is connected with oysters, p. 132. There is the phrase in ten fathom water, p. 121. The word untruth takes the sense of mendacium, i. 42. Silver is called white money, p. 55. There is the new Adjective westerly, which is confined to winds. We have the phrase if the worst fall, iv. 91. There is the verb trade, i. 51. We see make the approach, show lights, spring a mast, turn their tails, make much way (speed), as God would have it, fill water (fill casks with water), lose the sight of. We see the new sense of cut repeated in the year 1558, men cut (run) over the ground, iv. 190. A mark had hitherto been overshot; sailors now overshoot a harbour, v. 113. The word make gets the sense of putare; we made it to be Jamaica, p. 118. We have seen never so much; we now find tarry ever so little longer, p. 235. There is the verb moor, and also brackish, derived from the Dutch. There is the verb tack about, from the Celtic tack (nail, rope). Among the Romance words are top-gallant, tragedies (cruelties), offer skirmish (battle), reinforce, officer (of ship), to double the Cape, poop, pompion (pumpkin), breeze, to double along (tack), a complice, volley, in all respects. We hear of the carolins (carlini) of Naples, i. 55. A new feature in England is the number of Spanish words, such as morion, cask, tornado, turtle (the reptile), disembogue, flamingo. Some Indian words have been changed since Eden wrote, as canoe, maize, potato, v. 104; there is also hammock. The description, but not the name, of tobacco appears in p. 130. One tribe of Africans is called the Samboses, p. 95, whence comes Sambo. There is shark, said to come from the Greek karcharos; the old pesen makes way for the new Plural peas, p. 246. The French piquer, confused with an English verb, gives us, to pink a jerkin, p. 96. A cunning knave professes to tell fortunes, iv. 98; a new sense of the word. Hawkins uses reasonable weather for reasonably good weather, p. 215. He manures (manceuvres) a ship, p. 225. Certain London merchants form a Company for the Guinea trade ; we read of "Garrard and Company," pp. 231 and 232.

In 1559 certain lawyers are called the utter barr ; see Dr. Murray's Dictionary.

Many of Becon's works (Parker Society) date from about 1560. In his 'Prayers' we see the old Pernel (Petronilla) changed into Parnel, p. 267 ; pretty Parnel appears there as a nickname for a priest's mistress ; she is called Petronilla in p. 265 ; the name had represented a bad character, 200 years earlier. Another nickname is Good-wife Pintpot, p. 276. There is massmonger ; and we see a token of Becon's flight into Germany, when we find sin-flood (the Deluge) in p. 400. In p. 269 the mass is called both pedlary and pelting (paltry) ; the last word was to be used by Shakespere. There is the new phrase she-saint, p. 265. Keeping silence in p. 276 appears as play mum-budget (most Shakesperian) ; perlegere is Englished by run over. We remember Mr. Gladstone's famous hands off! addressed to the Austrian Emperor in 1880 ; hand off! say the Papists, p. 268, when insisting on putting the Eucharist into the mouths of the faithful. There is address himself to ; to degenerate. The term Calvinist appears for the first time in England, I think, in p. 401. The old husel is corrupted into hushel, and is called a Popish word in p. 380. Becon tells us that in some parts the faithful laity would cry to the priest at the Elevation, "hold up, Sir John, heave it a little higher!" p. 270. There is a most lively description of the blessing that Purgatory was to the priests in p. 277. Becon mentions "an old proverb used among us" (it was long afterwards to be rimed by Defoe), "wheresoever God buildeth his church, there the devil also buildeth his chapel," p. 400. The word flittermouses (bats) is a record of Becon's cure in Kent, p. 378.

Bishop Jewel (Parker Society), about 1560, mentions cuts and girds as weapons of controversy, p. 99 ; he has also the word scarecrow, p. 352. There is the phrase at random, I think for the first time, in p. 528. Mention is made of the Jannizers ; a title here given to the Pope's champions.

Bishop Pilkington's 'Sermons' (Parker Society) date from about 1560. He writes Bullen (probably pronounced with an accent on the last syllable) for Boulogne, much as Colayn was written for Cologne. Among the new Substantives are gamester, p. 663, also lip-labour, a toss-pot. The word foundation is replaced by ground-work, p. 495. Hildebrand, we are told, might be called a hell-brand. Among the Verbs are, fetch a high note, rack the rent, take him napping, p. 437. Men stand on figures (attach importance to), p. 379; hence "stand on his dignity." Physicians may put up their pipes (give up business), p. 601. Certain miracles would make a horse to laugh, p. 587; hence our horse laugh. Among the words brought back from Pilkington's exile in Germany are burghmaster, p. 259; a dotkin of money, p. 607, from the Dutch duyt (doit). There is the favourite pun bite-sheep for bishop; and this he derives from the Dutch name, p. 495. There is the famous swashbuckler, p. 151; the swash is Scandinavian, (ferire). Among the Romance words are carpet gentleman, to part companies (go asunder), time-server, to cozen (French cousiner), frizzle hair, a Christian man. The word Protestant was supplanting Gospeller in 1562; see p. 416. Pilkington enlarges on the old glories of England's archers; he gives a common byword, used of bad bowmen, "he shooteth like a Scot," p. 428. The Bishop shows us that the workmen of his time were as prone to scamping work as they are now; the labouring man at noon must have his sleeping time, p. 447; here a scene is described much like the opening chapter in 'Adam Bede.' It was a common proverb to speak of an idle man as an abbey lubber, a long lewd lither loiterer, p. 610. Pilkington was not strong in our history; he says that the Saxons drove out the Englishmen (Britons), p. 188. He remarks that the Northumbrians down to his own day have always recited the Paternoster, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments in English metre, never in Latin, p. 500. His own Northern forms are brether (fratres), duddles (duds).

In Collier's 'History of Dramatic Poetry,' vol. ii., there are some pieces given that date from about 1560. There is a tendency to contract and cast out letters; thus heile (our he'll) stands for he will, p. 376; there is whatsere (whatsoever), p. 381; tza (it is a), p. 374. We hear of the rection (insurrection), p. 368. The n is inserted in flincher, p. 374; and in the lengthner (one who lengthens), p. 380. We hear of a maister's mate (ship's officer), p. 293; there is the name Susan Sweetlips, p. 377. The old Adverb groveling (gruffinge) is made an Active Participle in p. 404, paving the way for grovel. There is to set a joint (broken), p. 9. A bell goes ding dong, p. 376. There is the Scandinavian verb flant, used of flags, p. 293. Among the Romance words are bayse (laurels), jigge (dance), to moyl, country dance. There is triump (a game at cards) and dewsace, p. 231. We hear of dise of vauntage, p. 376; hence "to take advantage of a man." We hear of a miser's wealth, p. 374; here the Latin word is first connected with money.

In 1561 came out Sackville's well-known play, our first tragedy, and our first specimen of blank verse on the stage. Many years earlier, Surrey had used this metre in a poem. Our earliest sea-song appeared about 1570; it may be seen in p. 293.

In the 'Babees' Book' (Early English Text Society) are many pieces dating from about 1560. A ship has its staies, p. 243. A boy should be courteous and free of cappe, p. 341; to cap had not yet been coined. The new use of handkerchiefs led Englishmen to blow the nose, p. 79; in p. 77 we see that to drink manerly was one thing, to quaff another. There is the new verb brable (brawl) in p. 92. The old smak (gustare) gets confused with the Dutch smak (fragor) in p. 344; a boy must not smack his lips.

Among the Romance words are shirt collar, conceites after dinner (our dessert), p. 68, to inable yourself to nurture (aptare), p. 74. The French coy takes the Teutonic ish and becomes coyish, meaning reserved, p. 94.

Heywood's 'Epigrams' were printed in 1562; I have used the modern reprint. Here we see the contractions thers (there is), lets (let us), tys (it is), Ile (I will). The b is struck out; we see uncomde (uncombed), p. 182, the old un- kempt. There is the very old guttural hekst (highest), p. 170 ; occurring in the old proverb here set out, when bale is hekst, boote is next ; to this I have lately referred. There are the two forms seen in the 'Promptorium,' ake and ache (dolor), pp. 131 and 111 ; in the latter page ache is used as a pun on the letter H. The w is inserted ; the cry who, addressed to a cart horse, replaces the old ho (stop), p. 152 ; the new word must have been sounded as huo, which was later to become our wo, or wo ho ! The Passive Participle of the old alayen (alloy) is written aloude, p. 178, and is rimed with proude ; the oi, it cannot be too often repeated, bore two very different sounds, both in France and England. The y replaces o ; we see ynions (onions), p. 206, which may still be heard. †

We find the new Substantive byrder, a man who goes a birding ; the word burde still keeps its old sense of pullus, p. 210. There is rennet, p. 118, derived from run, which meant coagulate in the 'Promptorium.' There is instep, p. 164, most likely from in and stoop (bend). We hear of the wind's ie, p. 114. The word fare comes to mean the passenger conveyed, p. 205. The word row is applied to a line of houses, as Paternoster row, p. 209. There is the proper name Dauson, p. 113. The word why is made a substantive ; what is the why ? (reason), p. 96 ; we know the wherefore and the why. We see dym syghted and the forcible starke staryng blinde, p. 113.

In p. 90 no whit and nought stand side by side. There is a curious idiom of the Accusative in p. 92 ; the question is asked, "am I Maccabæus or Iscariot ?" the answer is—

"Whom it please your mastership, him let it be."

As to the Verbs, creak is now used of a door, p. 99, shoes may stretche, p. 110, a clock goes, p. 213 ; there is take his arm, hang on his arm, a man stands to his tacklyng, p. 214, as in Foxe. There is the strong affirmative wel fare ale, I saie, p. 90. There is the Shakesperian take thine ease in thine inne, p. 132.

We see the new Adverbs fyrstly, lastly, and neerely (touch him neerely), p. 177. There is the command back ! (go back), p. 119. The though and the if had always been closely connected, as we see by the Latin etiamsi; in p. 145 stands I care not, though (if) I do.

As to Prepositions, the to had already supplanted the for in connexion with numbers; we now have the betting sentence, a thousande to one, he shall die, p. 179; it follows the verb change, as a nettle changes to a rose, p. 103; it is repeated in one short sentence, as go to olde fooles to scoole, p. 155.

There is the Scandinavian fledge.

Among the Romance words are out of place (unfitting), turn his tippet, a man is covered (puts on his hat), p. 156. A new phrase of 1530 is toyed with in p. 140—

We hear that cups may dysgyse a man, p. 184; hence disguised in liquor.

There are the proverbs—

Lyttle sayde, soone amended.”

The later Homilies of the Reformed English Church were put forth in 1562. Some old phrases are here retained, such as nice (in the sense of lascivus), soul health, miscreant (unbeliever), almsman (a word of Layamon's for almsgiver). The word doles stands for limites. In Homily ix. stands (he) is in rehearsing the prayer; here we see repeated the confusion of two idioms, that of the Participle and the Verbal Noun. In Homily ii. one edition translates alii by other, the old othere; the edition of 1563 corrupts this into others. The two meanings of silly are both in vogue; Judith is called a silly woman (poor, feeble), and elsewhere silly is coupled with foolish. There is pith of the argument (a new sense of the word), spokesman; this last word is curious, being formed from the Perfect, not from the Present; the s also is inserted. We see at the length, with the inserted, standing for our in the end. There is the new Verb to cap; and Sunday is called a standing (fixed) day for certain purposes; standing water had appeared earlier. In Sermon ii. Councils are holden, not held; the latter Participle was soon to replace the true old form, though we still use holden on solemn occasions. We see high fed horses; here the Adjective is used for the Adverb. The but (quin) comes into a new idiom in Sermon ii., "images were not so fast set up, but (he) pulled them down."

We see the noun gibe, which is Scandinavian, in Sermon x.

Among the Romance words is uniform. In Sermon ii. there is a philological discussion as to the difference between images and idols; in Scripture it is said, though not in common English speech, these mean the same; the Pope's party seem to have held images to be Christian, and idols to be pagan.

We see our common phrase, "he is no man's foe but his own." When men sneezed the usual cry was, "God help and St. John!" Sermon ii. The system of finger-posts seems to have been in vogue, "we use in cross-ways to set up a wooden or stone cross, to admonish the travelling man which way he must turn;" Sermon xi. Rebels of this time bore a banner with a plough painted on it, and underneath, God speed the plough; Sermon xxi. In Sermon viii. we are told to keep "the Christian sabbath-day, which is the Sunday;" some transgressors travel on Sunday without need, others, worse than the former, are "prancing in their pride, pranking and pricking, pointing and painting themselves."¹ Constantine and other Christians built churches, where people might go to keep holy their sabbath-day. One of the misdeeds of rebels is that they profane this day.

Stow has given us certain memoranda, dating from 1561 to 1567, when they end ('Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles,' Camden Society). The word pluck is here made a substantive, get a plucke at him, p. 121; there is byrd bolt, blynd ally, brode awake, where the brode keeps one of its old meanings, apertus. A merchant braky (broke, became bankrupt), p. 127. The Passive Infinitive follows none; no yce to be sene, p. 131. The Old and the New stand side by side in p. 130, all to blewne and shatterd in pecis, p. 130; there is the phrase fall from rughe words to blowes, p. 138; the last Dutch word, so common with us, had been very seldom used before this time. In p. 123 stands y^e weke ending y^e 23 of July; here an on is dropped after the Participle. The word Puritans occurs in 1567, and is applied to certain Anabaptists, p. 143.

Several plays, ranging between 1560 and 1570, may be found in Dodsley's 'Collection' (Hazlitt's Edition). In 'New Custom,' vol. iii., there is full in the face, plain dealing.

In 'Appius and Virginia,' vol. iv., the metre is most easy; that of the Prologue is the same that Lord Macaulay used when handling the same subject. There is the contraction f'pence, p. 118; churl and carl are used in the same line as terms of reproach, p. 149. There are the new Substantives Maypole and drumble (a sleepy head); this last may have had its influence on the future humdrum. In p. 112 ladies are called sparks, in all honour; the word was later to be applied to the other sex. In p. 122 stands the word thwick thwack; here a w has been inserted in the old thack (ferire). In p. 120 vixen (she fox) is used of a woman. In p. 118 stands "as stout as a stockfish;" hence it is that Shallow fights with one Simon Stockfish. The phrase my dear comes often; it was to be a favourite one of Sidney's. In p. 152 stands I proffer you fair, where the adjective seems to become a substantive. In p. 138 is have with ye to Jericho, imitated from the have at you of 1360. In p. 151 stands hap that hap may. There is the renowned by Jove! p. 124; a fig for it! p. 135; body of me! p. 121. There is the Dutch verb hustle, and the Scandinavian jaunt (travel). Among the Romance words are haphazard, the name of a character. We saw vengeance holy a few years earlier; in p. 150 we have run with a vengeance. In p. 125 stands O passing piece, said of a lady; hence was to come masterpiece. In the same page Apelles made a piece (picture); hence sea piece. A man who is uncivil is said never to have learned his manners in Siville; this pun is in p. 151. There is the proverb, "if hap the sky fall, we may hap to have larks," p. 124. The old form file (polluere) is much used in this play.

In 'Jack Jugler,' vol. ii., we have the substantive elder-ship, and the adjectives toothsome, light-fingered, tricksy. The it is used much in the sense of yonder, as it is a spiteful girl, p. 117. We see sit stewing, set a good face on it, play you a prank. A woman is said to simper, to bridle, to swim to and fro, p. 117; the first of these verbs is Scandinavian; the swim here first gets a meaning something like ambulare. From box (alapa) is coined a transitive verb. There is smell strong, in the sense of olere. The Dutch dollen (to sport) produces doll (amica), p. 169; hence Doll Tearsheet. In p. 223 we hear of puss, our cat; this word may come either from the Celtic, the Dutch, or the Scandinavian. Among the Romance words are play the truand (here used of children), to lacquey. The pity-craving poor is applied by the speaker to himself; to get poor me, p. 116. The new oath was coming in, a damned knave, p. 178.

'Gammer Gurton's Needle,' probably due to Bishop Still, was written in 1566, with a good swinging metre; it is in Dodsley, iii. 172. Among the Substantives are a pin's head, dodge (dolus), p. 193, tithepig, a book-oath, the swill tub. There is fine gentleman; a certain man is called a two legged fox. Among the Verbs are to slop up milk (bibere), p. 193; like our slangy "mop up sherry;" dodge (decipere), p. 254. There is a foretaste of a common phrase, thou rose not on thy right side (got up the wrong side of the bed), p. 193. A new Interrogative idiom crops up in p. 181, "ye have made a fair day's work, have you not?" The new Scandinavian jib (velum) is in p. 211; set the jib forward. Among the Romance words are gaffer, gammer (here it means mistress; we may remember the York commoder), trump (a game at cards, p. 199), lose a trump, p. 174, to pass sport (go beyond a joke), p. 202. The dame is prefixed to a poor woman's surname, as Dame Chat. Old English words are put into the mouths of peasants, as sickerly, swyth, and tite (protenus). The Western dialect appears, as ch'am, ich cham, vilthy (filthy); in p. 240 stands the Shakesperian God eild you!

The 'Trial of Treasure' dates from about the same time as the foregoing piece. The a is added at the end of a verse to lengthen it out; I do delight-a stands in p. 290, riming with plight-a; this was to become very common. A lady is called mouse, p. 293. We see lash out (kick), p. 298, tune my pipes. A French line comes in p. 277; there is also a specimen of Flemish.

The play 'Like will to Like' dates from about the same time. Here we see knave of clubs, skipjack, snip-snap. The too, so favoured in this Century, reappears; is not this too bad? p. 317. We see run a race. There is bottle-nosed, to scan, pledge them all carouse, p. 339. The adverb nicely (properly) is used much as it is now, p. 331.

In Dodsley, iv., we find the play of 'Damon and Pithias' of the date of 1567; many of Foxe's new words are found here. We see that joy is made to rime with away, p. 100. There is the contraction t'is. Wickliffe's word barnacle now appears in the Plural, meaning spectacles, p. 81. In p. 72 a man may seem a great bug (big wig); I believe this is still an American sense of the word. There is seat (situation), p. 35; it is here situs, not sedes. A servant is addressed as my boy, p. 28. There is share and share alike, p. 83. Among the Adjectives are sea sick, log headed (wooden headed), deep in merchant's books; a new phrase. The word good now means validus; "try who is the better man of us," p. 67; this must come from have the better. In p. 17 stands "I was somebody" (a great man); the nobody had already been applied to Gardiner. In p. 16 a courtier says, "I can help one;" we should set number after the Infinitive. So unusual was the old all and sum that a clown in p. 70 is made to say, "I have wit enough, whole and sum."

Among the Verbs are give him the slip, a knot may slip, he has bees in his head, there is somewhat in the wind, make things worse, to look high (seem proud), make an impression, stretch one point. In p. 40 stands to pouch up money (for his own use); in our time, a liberal friend pouches school-boys. The verb breathe now becomes transitive, to breathe ourselves, p. 69. There is the new phrase if I speak, hang me! p. 41; this we should now transpose. The new Interrogative have I not? crops up after an affirmation in

p. 60. Skelton's touch on the quick is now altered into touch to the quick, p. 11. The at is used to translate the French au; take me at my word, p. 56; "prendre au mot." The curse a plague take him! stands in p. 102.

There is sconce (caput) from the Dutch; also the Celtic plod and coil (stir) in keep a coil, p. 24.

Among the Romance words are, to incense him against, catch him into a trip, p. 23; hence "catch him tripping." We see he has a wooden face; in p. 74 a servant speaks French to astonish a friend, and calls him petit Zawne (zany or sawny); an Italian word. Foxe's favourite word sycophant (informer) is here much coupled with parasite, showing a change of meaning. We see presently taking our shade of meaning in p. 90; for here it is not protenus, since there is an interval of time; the foreign word shared the fate of our by and by. In p. 33 we have a pun, your course is very coarse; our translation of cursus and the Adjectival form of the word. There are the old forms meve and lese (move and lose).

In 'Dodsley,' vol. iv., may be found the play of 'Cambyses.' There is the contraction what's that? p. 219. Gower's of kin now becomes akin to, p. 226. The initial w is struck out, as ich ould (I would), p. 220; we often hear I ood now. The z for s is here much used by rustics. The old curst (crabbed) has its letters transposed and becomes crusty (p. 184). In p. 177 three ruffians appear as Huff, Ruff, and Snuff; in p. 223 we come upon a box on the ear. The one (Number one) appears once more in its new meaning, it is wisdom to save one, p. 187. A rustic makes a retort not obsolete even now, and thou call'st me knave, thou art another, p. 220; here such ought to be the last word; we may remark the contraction call'st. There is hark in your ear, make a match (marriage) with me. The Infinitive had been used much like an Interjection in 1290; I to leve þe þus! this is slightly altered in p. 185, thou a soldier and loose thy weapon! here to be should follow thou; this led to Shakespere's what! a young knave, and beg! something like this we have seen in Udall's play. In p. 236 we light upon the dance called hey diddle diddle; this rimes here with fiddle. There is black pudding. The old manqueller now becomes execution-man, often repeated. The old pous goes back to its Latin form; my pulses beat is in p. 218. A rustic uses the strange form bum vay (by my fay), p. 219.

The 'Marriage of Wit and Science,' in vol. ii., dates from 1570. The a replaces o, as sprat for sprot. The new Substantives are crackbrain (whence our cracky), this spindleshanks, a Jack sprat. In p. 362 Darby's bands may mean shackles; hence the darbies. There is the Shakesperian phrase, the top of the desire. The word fan is now used in the sense best known to ladies. There is the new begone! and she takes on her like a queen, p. 350; here some word like state should follow the verb. In p. 362 stands speak, off or on? (shall we remain or go?); here the verb shall we be is dropped. A country lout says, hey tisty tust, p. 376; I well remember the nursery phrase tisty tosty, cowslip ball. There is the new turn of phrase, it is a good fault.

In the Letters in Ellis' Collection, from 1553 to 1576, we see the i encroaching on e; Elizabeth writes from the very first indide (indeed), bin (been), and other words of the same kind; the form gentill (used by Sadler) appears again, whence our genteel, differing from gentle; there is shoed (monstravit), where o replaces the sound of u. Mary Queen of Scots writes quin, hesti, gul, for queen, hasty, good; doubtless the Northern Stuarts did much to bring in the new Northern pronunciation which took root in London after 1600; Raleigh, speaking his broad Devon at Court, must have been thought very provincial (Aubrey's 'Lives'). Among the Substantives is bigness, the cock of a pistol; room adds the meaning of camera to its old sense, spatium. There is the Verb blast slanders of her (hence "a blasted character"). The verb make gets the new sense of evenire; he will make a rare prince. The to is developed, say to the contrary, to their likeing. Among the Romance words are cabinet, joynt of motton, demy God, proprietary (owner), skeptik (used by Buchanan). Sandys unfolds a peece of his mynde. Gresham writes of th' interest of 12 per cent by the year. The room where Rizzio died was about 12 footes square, a new way of measuring. A new phrase replaces devil; what a mischeefe meaneth he, vol. iv. p. 8. The word practise is used of lawyers as well as of physicians, a lawyer of great practise. The old bid is supplanted by a French word, invite to supper. We hear of committees (men entrusted). The adjective rare appears, with the meaning of eximius, a rare prince.

Burghon's 'Life of Gresham' gives us many letters, ranging from 1554 to 1571. The great merchant is fond of ie and ye, writing Lieth and Lye for Leith and Lee. The old acumba (tow) becomes okym (oakum). The t is prefixed; Cecil's daughter Anne is called Tannikin, i. 227; much as Edward afterwards became Ted. The w is struck out; we read of the bishop of Norrige, i. 479. It is prefixed; an Irish earl appears as Wormonde, ii. 155. The s is prefixed; Sprague is the capital of Bohemia, ii. 8; in this way Spruce had already been formed.

Among the Substantives is waftage (conveyance by sea), i. 197; Gresham uses waft in a sense different from that employed by Cavendish a year or two earlier. We see fit of ague, mainmast, mills for powder, drinking penny, begging letter, the Queen's stamp. A horse is twelve handfulls high, i. 346; we now strike out the full. A board appears, meaning the persons sitting at table, ii. 162; hence we now call companies boards. There are the new words firelock, freebooter. There are the phrases as good luck was, between man and man. A person wishes to go for health to the Spa, ii. 93.

Among the Adjectives handsome seems to get the new sense of largus, ii. 42; it is used of a man that has behaved hospitably; hence our handsome offer. There is best heddyd (clever), smooth-tongued, my last (here letter is suppressed), i. 398, nothing short of death, p. 322. Gresham is, I think, the last great Englishman who took much pleasure in the Double Negative.

Among the Verbs we see an old Southern form in constant use, they lyeth (jacent). A town holds out, a sight is worth to go 100 myles to see it, i. 255, give him to understand, take the wynde of us, make a start, make despatch, run in danger, it is given out that, bosom-creeping Italians. The verb hail is used in a new way; hayl a ship, ii. 42. The make gets the meaning of perficere; make six miles, p. 70. A man is markyd, p. 168; this verb had hitherto been used of animals in the chase. Money lies dead (useless), p. 421; hence a dead loss.

Among the Adverbs this may be remarked; a lady when unwell is described as yll at ease, ii. 443; this ill, made an adjective, was almost to drive out the old sick, except in America.

Among the Prepositions are, at all eventes (adventures), i. 234, of force (perforce). In ii. 200 certain men are Protestants for their lives (earnest); hence our "run for your life." Another new use of for stands in p. 19, to depart for Deventor.

There is the German dallor (dollar), i. 334. In ii. 284 mention is made of deel boards; this sense of the noun comes from the Dutch. We see the verb carouse (gar aus), a cup thoroughly emptied. The word excise, ii. 245, reverses the usual order of things, for it comes to us through the Dutch from the French; it is another form of assise.

As to Gresham's Romance words, what strikes us most is the number of our technical mercantile terms, first found in his letters. Such are dytto, bill of credit, bill of exchange, bill of lading, the chiffer (cypher), to assewre (insure) goods, a power for money. More's bancke-roupt appears here as banke-rowte. The L. S. D., representing the Italian liri, soldi, denari, may be found in i. 432. We see the Italian verb bastanado, i. 269, mentioned by Gresham, living at Antwerp; this was due to the town's Southern masters. An English knight talks of his coche (coach) in 1556; see i. 483. Gunpowder is sent over in poncheones, p. 318. A lottery is established in London in 1568 (ii. 338). The Protestant places of worship in Flanders are called tempells, p. 154. There are phrases like repose trust in, time serves, remember me to her, chargeable (expensive), system, a sure ship, charge pistols (a new noun), colourable bargains, waiting woman. The word stay (morari) is in constant use. A duke invites himself to a house, ii. 184; this verb was encroaching on the Teutonic bid. The artists of that age appear as picture makers, p. 467. The word mynyster gets a new sense, that of legatus, i. 399. The Prince of Orange is called his excellentie, ii. 206; he has Gresham to dine and gives him verie great intertainment, p. 160; hence the last word might easily come to mean cæna. In p. 196 stands Ansians (ancients, companies) of footmen; a new sense of the word, which was soon to be transferred to their commander. A knight bequeaths his celestial globe and a case of compases, p. 459.

Calfhill, a Shropshire man, in 1565 wrote an answer to Martiall's 'Treatise of the Cross' (Parker Society). He prefixes a to a word, as aweary, p. 289; he adds n to a word, as to lessen it, p. 331; this can hardly be the old Infinitive form. Among his Substantives we see loadstone, birth sin. The old stikelinde (steadfastly) of the Hali Meidenhad (perhaps a Salopian piece) gives birth to stickler (champion), p. 8. In p. 118 we see poor souls (miseri homines). In p. 176 the old sink (latrina) is used in a moral sense; a palace becomes a sink of sectaries. Trevisa's popehode (papacy) becomes popedom, p. 323. In p. 236 old mother Maukin (Malkin, Mary) is used as a synonym for a fool; it is just possible that this may have had some influence on our future mawkish (foolishly precise). Among the Adjectives are blockish, a sore point; there is the Comparative foolisher; Lydgate's kingli is turned into kinglike, p. 6. We read of a live man, p. 387, Udall's new adjective. There are, moreover, the new adjectives long lived, sole lived (celibate), better lived. Our author begins in page 1 with a pun on cross, his subject; he makes it an adjective, as overthwart had been made earlier; cross and overthwart proofs, p. 72; in p. 113 we have cross luck (ill fortune); here the word begins to bear our sense froward. The one is made much more emphatic than in the old an hund scipa; Calais was lost in one three days, p. 114.

There are the Verbs unbody (leave the body), unwonted. There are the phrases leave (prowess) to others, not so sound as it had been to be wished (could be wished), p. 71, we are given to understand, that, p. 364; a bone for you to pick on, p. 277; hence our "a bone to pick with you." There is a most terse new idiom in p. 371, when a question has to be answered; what would he have done? Damned them to the Devil; but long before this time we have seen the curt phrase well answered, at the beginning of a sentence. We light on the phrase it is too absurd, p. 375; too bad appeared about this same time.

Among the Romance words are paradox, interreign, impertinent, to disgrace him, instinct, hyperbole, quid pro quo, Tom fool, p. 226, pleadable, unconscionable, p. 177, comma, nonsuit, porkling, expostulate, rotary (nun). The word humanity had long been used both for courtesy and kindness; Calfhill, following Tyndale, uses courtesy in the graver sense of kindness in p. 22; an Emperor, refraining from slaughter, shows courtesy. The word humour stands for fancy in p. 208. A canker (cancer) is in a woman's breast, p. 329. In p. 54 we hear of a theologian's common place (usual argument); we now often make the phrase an Adjective. In p. 81 a physician's prescription is called a bill. The verb squat, p. 179, keeps its old sense of comprimere, soon to be changed. The adjective temporal stands where we happily substitute another form, temporary, p. 245. The words chrism and chrisom are distinguished in p. 224; the latter meaning a white garment, used at baptism. Authors should be reconciled in p. 251; that is, their writings should be made to agree. A man is posted to do a future action when his quew (cue) comes, p. 209. The verb track stands in p. 198; trace and track have no common derivation, but they both come to us through France, the former from the Low Latin, the latter from the German. In p. 331 egregious is used in a bad sense as usual in English, play the varlet egregiously. The word sot belonged to the South and West; it is used in its old sense of stultus, p. 273, and was to take a new sense twenty years later. The word personal, hitherto rare, appears in p. 288; examples, taken from the conduct of good men, may possibly be only personal, and not prompted by God. The verb muster keeps its old sense, the Cross musters (shows) fair, p. 352. The verb urge takes the new sense of press upon us; ye urge a miracle, p. 329. The phrase turn over the leaf had already appeared; we now have turn over histories, p. 93. The word sense had of late years come in, expressing sapientia; we therefore find senseless, p. 103. The same distinction is drawn between worship and adore as between colere and adorare, p. 373. Martiall had been an usher at Winchester; Calhill treats him as a scholar in an amusing dialogue in p. 201; one sentence is down with him; give me the rod here. Martiall uses the term lurde (heavy), p. 361; the other says he knows not what is meant. Our author is fond of puns; in his first page he plays upon the words cross, humanity, and martial. In p. 158 reason may bear the sense of raisin, as Falstaff afterwards employed the word. I suspect that Calhill attempts a pun in p. 186, where he speaks of the members of the Second Council of Nice (which established image-worship) as "the Nice masters;" nice might still bear its old sense stultus. Puritanism crops up in p. 363; it is superstitious to call our churches by the names of Saints, as St. Peter's church. There is the phrase "find a pin's head in a cartload of hay," p. 173; "have a quarrel to Rowland, and fight with Oliver," p. 374. We light upon a most truthful proverb in p. 113, bustum Anglorum Gallia, Gallorum Italia; this takes a range of history from Edward III. to the first Duke of Guise. The New Indians are mentioned in p. 338.

Our Salopian author has God wot, land leaper, to astart (start up). The word sere (particular), used in p. 279, would alone show that he came from the Northern part of England; this word the Editor derives from the Latin! Like others of his Century, Calhill sometimes mistakes the old to (dis), coining all to becrossed and such like, though he used all to pulled (dilaceratus) in the right way, p. 92.

Ascham wrote his 'Schoolmaster' about 1565; I have used Upton's edition of 1711. Among the Substantives are cockpit, hedge priest. Oldness, p. 204, is revived after a long sleep; eld had been thrown aside. The term thing is degraded, and is scornfully applied to a man, p. 42; it might earlier have been used of Christ or the Virgin. In p. 55 Elyot's term a goodfellow (glutton) is used to express our rake; an instance of the degradation of a word; this sense lasted till 1730. In p. 52 broad cloths are opposed to rags. In p. 87 we hear of makers of love. In p. 92 the Greek akme is Englished by the highest pitch; a new substantive. Ascham had already brought in cut (vulnus); in p. 194 he talks of the short cut of a private letter; here the words seem to mean "paltry course." Among the Adjectives are a hot head, an odd man (peculiarly able, p. 112). Precepts may be cold (chilling), p. 163, very different from Barclay's sense of the word. The old sterling had been applied only to money; Ascham makes a method of study, sterling, p. 106. In p. 136 ill humour is used of the body, not the mind. A great innovation is found in p. 11, your great beaters, speaking of harsh schoolmasters; the your, here not needed at all, was employed henceforward, much as Shakespere used it, as your Englishman.

Among the Verbs are patch it up, ill brought up (ill bred), to breed up youth, rap out oaths, a spent old man, p. 196; Ascham in his Yorkshire home had once doubtless used forspent. Chaucer's old word twinne (separare) had so thoroughly gone out that Ascham uses untwine for the same idea, p. 72; a word newly formed from the old twinnan. He has he dislikes it, p. 100, instead of the old it dislikes me. There is the new adverb outlandishlike, p. 204. The far is now used before a Superlative, as far best of all, p. 135; here we should place the before the adjective. Palsgrave had done things "against the hair;" Ascham will not force wits against the wood (grain), p. 15.

Among the Romance words are point out a thing, butcherly, and Foxe's new word decorum. There is the Greek syntaxis, epitome; akme and atheoi appear in the Greek character; Ascham mourns that the last word should be known in England, p. 83. The adjective brave is used as a synonym for warlike in p. 43; it was in the North that the word had first implied courage. In the next page we hear of a desperate hat (a desperado's head gear). We read of places

(passages) of Herodotus, p. 115. Something is done, in p. 57, according to the square and rule of wisdom; hence "act on the square," "go by rule." In p. 83 men pass for no doctors; here the verb means to care, very different from its later sense. The Participle staid is now used much like an adjective; a man may be of staid judgment, p. 160. Ascham is well known for his horror of Italian debauchery and atheism, brought home by young English travellers. He says that there is more comely plate in one city of England than there is in the four proudest cities of Italy, Rome included, p. 191. It is a sign of the times that young girls get married against their parents' will, p. 39. He gives a list of pastimes proper for young gentlemen in p. 58; among these is, to shoot surely in (with) gun; this seems to be a new accomplishment. He tells us that his old college of St. John's at Cambridge owed much to the benefactions of Northern gentlemen, who were persuaded thereto by worthy Dr. Medcalfe; this Master must have been to St. John's in 1530 as great a blessing as Dr. Jenkins was to Balliol in 1850. Ascham objects to the English practice of using rimes in poetry; time and custom, it seems, drew our bards towards the barbarous Goths, not to the Greeks, p. 184. He praises Surrey for avoiding rime when Englishing Virgil. Our tongue, being chiefly made up of monosyllables, is, according to Ascham, best suited for Iambics. Some make the worthy wit Chaucer a God in verse, p. 187; Chaucer's ablest imitator was already alive when Ascham was writing.

John Awdeley printed his 'Fraternitie of Vacabondes' (Early English Text Society, Extra Series) in 1561, which was reprinted four years later. The roger of 1540 now appears as roge (rogue), p. 5; Barclay's excheater appears as cheatour; it means no longer an official, but a genteel swindler at cards, p. 7. An Abraham man is one who shams madness and nameth himselfe poore Tom, p. 3. The thieves' women are called dozies, p. 4; this word is now best known by the famous pun on Orthodoxy. The word chete stands for res; a tooth is a crashing chete; in our day men say, "that's the chat." An idle runagate boy is called a Kitchin Co', p. 5; I suppose the later kinchin cove. We hear of a priggarr (fur), p. 4. In p. 15 comes esen dropper (eavesdropper), who stands under the window to hear secrets; this is one of the twenty-five Orders of knaves. In p. 4 a man gets a share or snap unto himself; hence comes to go snacks, with the usual interchange of c and p. In p. 8 we hear of a stock of money for trading purposes. In p. 6 a back lane is mentioned; a designing man is referred to, and he is afterwards spoken of as this child, p. 6. The term quire stands for carcer; this word may have had some influence in making queer so common; "be in Queer Street." There is the new phrase to cry halfe part (halves), commarnd him (have his services), both in p. 10; to black his shoes, p. 15. There is the phrase a tittivell knave, p. 15; Tutivillus was the name of a rogue in the 'Towneley Mysteries.' One of the profession, pretending to be a simple countryman, takes care to use the ich am (I am), p. 8.

A still larger work was devoted to thieves and their language by Thomas Harman in 1567; this became the standard book on the subject for scores of years. It is reprinted along with Awdeley's work. The w is struck out; we see Alhollanday, p. 51, whence some churches are called Allhollands. The d is clipped, as vagabon, p. 27. There is the great contraction Shropshyre, p. 51. The n is prefixed in Ned, p. 79. The form make (conjux), used in an early edition, is changed to mate in the edition of 1573, p. 41. The old exclamation aye is printed i in pp. 65 and 92, which shows that the i was losing its French sound. There are the new Substantives rabblement, out house, his leavings, harelyp. Harman coaxed his friends the beggars, and thus, as he says, attained to the typ (secret), p. 20; here we have one of the many words belonging to peddelars Frenche or Canting, p. 23; a language that had been known, according to Harman, for little more than thirty years; we still hear of racing tips. In p. 34 canting stands for begging; in p. 82 togeman stands for a coat, whence comes toggerly. Several of these words have lasted to our day, such as bowsing ken (tippling house), cofe (man), gyger (door). A woman of loose conduct is called a Marian, p. 62; Maid Marion was a well-known ballad heroine. In p. 46 men fall from wordes to blowes; for blows men would have substituted striking rather earlier. We hear of markes on clothes, p. 33; a new sense of the word. In thieves' dialect cranke means the falling sickness, p. 51; and glymmar means fire, p. 61; in our time glim stands for candle. In p. 83 Pilkington's Northern word dudes (vestes) is set down as pedlar's French; so also is drawers, p. 83, a word used by thieves for the hosen of common English; this Plural term drawers has since become a most respectable word. Among the Adjectives the foreign squaimous is altered into squaymysh, p. 55. We see small money (whence our small change), naked as ever he was borne, p. 56, odde endes (odds and ends), in the ded of the night. The word strong stands for numerous; "they go strong as three or four in a company," p. 33. The good is prefixed to another adjective; a good longe daye, p. 37. The flexen (flaxen) is applied to a beard, p. 55. There is the new phrase wyth all celeryty, p. 54; where all stands for maximus. An adverb replaces an adjective after the verb look; loke wildly, p. 40; hence Shakespere's you look angerly; I have bene madly handlyd stands in p. 64; hence the madly used Malvolio.

Among the Verbs are set up house, sit out the company; there is the sudden holde (stop) in the middle of a sentence, p. 39. There is a new construction of do in p. 41, "they made me swear," says one; what, dyd they? is the answer. In p. 86 tryne on the chates is explained as "hang on the gallows." Scott in 'Woodstock' has "trine to the nubbing cheat," where trine is used in its old Lancashire sense of gradi. In p. 31 a man affirms something, meaning nothinge lesse; here the two last words stand for non. There are some new uses of for; trust men for their vitales, p. 33 (give them credit as regards their victuals); also for his life he could not pluck it, p. 40. The for is added, as it were, inseparably, to the Participle unlooked; I had it unlooked for, p. 35.

Among the Romance words are paulmistrice, their credit (in trade), an impression (in printing), mullion, quarter staffe, condign punishment, conservees, undecent. In p. 22 the pre- misses stand for habitation, a new sense of the word; good natur (kindness) is revived, p. 42. In p. 23 men go to gipsies to know their fortunes, p. 23. In p. 50 declination stands for refusal; the Scotch still talk of declinature. In p. 52 paynefull means amarus, not laboriosus, as of old. In p. 54 cage is used as a prison for men. The verb temper is developed; temper with me, p. 70; Foxe has the same expression, writing about this time; the form tamper, which makes a useful distinction, came a few years later. In p. 28 we still see my cost and travell (trouble). There is the phrase beholde the coaste about them cleare, p. 30; this has nothing to do with the sea. The robber's technical verb delyver is in p. 30; rather later it was to be coupled with stand. We have already heard of the freedom and the franchise of towns; we now have the lyberties of London, p. 51. Harman says that he was once in commission of the peace, p. 60; this word commission was afterwards to be greatly extended. There is the phrase I have bene attempted (of robbers), p. 66.

The author says, deluded man, that the gipsies have been banished and their memory extinguished, p. 23. An oath, which was slowly coming into fashion, is set out at great length in p. 55, "I pray God I bee dampned both body and soule, yf," etc.; this is put into the mouth of a cranke; Harman deals with the knave just as a Mendicity officer would do in our own day. About a hundred Irish men and women had been burnt out by the Earl of Desmond, and wandered about England to beg; they went round with counterfeit licenses, and if straitly examined pretended that they could speak no English, pp. 44 and 82.

Grindal, when Bishop of London about 1563 (Parker Society), has the new phrase country gentleman, p. 257; he talks of the players' bills, p. 269; he has none of Foxe's tolerance for these gentry, who are now said to profane God's words by their impure mouths.

J. Partridge printed a riming Legend of Plasidas in 1566 (Horstmann's 'Altenglische Legenden,' p. 474); it is most curious that there should have been any demand for such literature after the Reformation. The proper name Trayan is made a trisyllable, p. 487, as is also rampier, p. 485; the old sounds of ai and ie were now altering; the r is inserted, for boystrous appears in p. 479. We hear of pikemen and of the wings of an army. The verb fetch takes a new sense; we see fetching frischoes (frisks), p. 479; this meaning of allicere has come down to our own day. Soldiers keep aray (their ranks), p. 485. Among the Romance words are confusedly, massive, troupe (of horsemen), file (line). The word fatal, applied to a man, means fate-doomed, p. 482. The verb discrie had meant describere in 1520; it now means videre, p. 485.

About this time Sir Thomas Smith tells us that the vowel i was pronounced like eye and aye; the change, first seen in the North, was now established at London. See Ellis, 'Early English Pronunciation' (Early English Text Society, Extra Series), i. 112.

In the 'Life of Sir Peter Carew' we see the old form thandes (the hands), written by Sir Henry Sidney in 1570, much in Caxton's style, p. 242. The old name Piers now becomes Peirce, p. 238. There is the famous West Country surname Prediaux, probably pronounced like the French Predieuse; the sound is much altered in our days. The old form beseke is still found; also yeven (given) in a letter of Elizabeth's, p. 189. The substantive gentleman is twice cut down to gent, pp. 156 and 173; I have remarked on this before. A lawyer is called Sir Peter's man; that is, agent, p. 273. A well-known Welsh harbour opposite Dublin appears as The holy hedd, p. 251. There are the verbs lay him op by the helys, matters go on leisurely. The Romance words are dowlas, dyaper, cesse (tax), posytt (a deposit), martyall lawe, incownter, orderly, ill usage. From this last came the verb ill use; here, and also in ill treat, we place the adverb before the verb, a curious construction.

Levins, a Yorkshireman, brought out his Dictionary ('Manipulus Vocabulorum,' Early English Text Society) in 1570. Many of our old words are still found here, as eame (uncle), ocker (usury), tite (quickly). Udall's verb flag now becomes fag (deficere); fag end was to come fifty years later. There are many Adjectives in ish, as boyish, newish, hoggish. The un is often prefixed to Romance words, as unbeautiful. The first hint of our blind man's buff is seen in hodeman blind (a play), p. 135. The curse y^e wenyant is translated in malam crucem. Wickliffe's verb wel (conflare) still remains without a d at the end, p. 55. The verb wriggle seems to give birth to rigge (lascivire), p. 119; hence our to run rigs. There is the Celtic mug; the Scandinavian byre (cow house); the Dutch moppe (movere labia); hence the later mop and mow. The Latin lippus is expressed not only by sandblinde, but by poreblinde, p. 135; the pur blind of 1300 had slightly changed its meaning, owing to some confusion with the verb pore. The word fitchew is revived. We see serly (imperiosus), p. 99, which must come from sire; it was soon to become surlly; serwish, with the same meaning, stands in p. 145. In p. 38 men battle commons; the terms are still well known at Oxford. There is the bird wigion.

A ballad, printed in 1570, may be seen in Tarlton's 'Jests' (Halliwell), p. 126. The patriarch Noe becomes Noy, p. 129, riming with destroy; here the old sound of oy was becoming more like that of our modern oy. A river flows with such a hed (impetus), p. 127, a new sense of the word; hence Gascoign makes head; Milton's fears get head. In p. 129 stands no way but to be lost, where is (est) is dropped; this foreshadows no way but this, in Othello. There is the Dutch adjective frolick (lætus). We see the curious word misdeformed, p. 126; where either the mis or the de should have been dropped. In p. 128 the weather changes. Tarlton, though no Puritan, talks about the Saboth day, p. 129.

William Lambarde wrote his 'Perambulation of Kent' in 1570, publishing it six years later; this is the first of our County Histories. We see ai take the place of e, as in the transitive quail (comprimere), p. 369; the i supplants e, as quire of a church, p. 343; the ie replaces e, as crossier, p. 223. The old trace and the new track are used as synonyms, pp. 325 and 326. The old hauty becomes haughty, p. 471; here a French word adopts a Teutonic form. We hear of

Among the new Substantives are wear (vestitus), warder, sweep (of a river), blocke (impedimentum), in the nicke (of a battle), p. 422. There are the phrases will worship ; also wilfull worshipper, mill for paper, bone of dissention. There is fourre foote of water ; in measuring, we do not use feet, but make foot Plural, as "six foot high." St. Thomas of England is called a new found Godlyng, p. 394. A retired residence is called a withdrawing house, p. 464 ; paving the way for drawing room. There is the Adjective brassie (impudent). We see two third partes, p. 257 ; this use of fractions had hitherto been rare.

Among the new Verbs is underprop. There are the phrases call into question, storms blow over, take issue, keep the saddle, take occasion by the forehead (our forelock), p. 417, leave no stone untaken up. The old verb jog is now applied to a horse in motion, p. 206. The verb settle is used of earth that sinks downwards, p. 326 ; hence architects dread a settlement. Piers break the swiftness of a stream, p. 344 ; this sense, obstare, is new. The verb shrowd adds the sense of celare to its old meaning vestire, p. 427. The verb wind up is employed for finire in p. 433. We see both the old overlive a man and the later outlie a man. Men have enough to do to save themselves, p. 370 ; a most curious instance of the Double Infinitive ; but here to do must stand for ado (labor). Men do not fire guns (see Palsgrave), but give fire to them, p. 390.

Among the Prepositions are slay to the last man, for pitie's sake, the castle was in his eie (thoughts), p. 337, they were of dutie bound to bring, etc.

We see baw waw (bow wow), p. 233, when reference is made to Erasmus comparing the English tongue, abounding in monosyllables, to a dog's bark.

There is the Scandinavian beach, p. 134 ; also the Celtic rill.

Among the Romance words are antiquary, tenant right, the remains, exploits, to single (out), to prise up (raise), preachment, abjure the realm, change his note, consist of, curtail, increment, to embattle, tunnel, plausible, continue it, moiety. Lambarde prints a word in Greek letters now and then; he further has typography, orgia, etymon, parenthesis, and compounds the monstrous Prototraitour, p. 284, applied to St. Thomas; this is as bad as mobocracy. The old querister now makes way for choriste, p. 261, showing the regard paid to Greek forms. The word memorie replaces mind, recollection within memoire, p. 5. The verb train is now applied not only to children but to soldiers, trained companies, p. 65; hence the later trainbands. The word butcherie is used for cædes, p. 123. The noun flourish is used of a fantastic signet, something like a knot, p. 365. The noun front is used of a building, p. 367; in the same page Lambarde talks of the last scene of his life, a word borrowed from the stage. The word levell stands for planities, p. 397; we know the Bedford Level. The word poesie now comes to mean a motto under a coat of arms, p. 450. The verb manure is used for colere, p. 499. The word relatives stands for consanguinei, p. 505. The word patriotes, a new term, is applied in p. 222 to King Henry's fruiterer, who planted in England the sweet cherry, the temperate pippin, and the golden renate. A man becomes of the monkes devotion, p. 286 (acts at their bidding). There is the mongrel compound note woorthie, p. 399. The foreign Leuga (league) is remarked as appearing in the Lowy, a tract of land round Tunbridge, p. 383; this name dates from Norman times.

We find that many things happen betweene the Cup and the Lippe, p. 422.

Lambarde uses Bryttish for Welsh, p. 257. Like Foxe, he sets out some Old English documents, also some Old French papers; Leland, Parker, and Foxe had been instigating England to search out her antiquities. Kent had lost her old pre-eminence of 1340 as the main stronghold of Old English forms; Lambarde affirms that the counties near London said borne (natus), where they of the West Country used yborne. He says that his Kentish countrymen still spoke of a partition of land as a shifting, the Old English for divisio. He points out the peculiarity to be seen among the Cheshire gentry in 1570; Thomas a Bruer- ton was there used for Thomas Bruerton, and such like. Lambarde makes the very natural mistake that wynd and way were borrowed from the Latin ventus and via, p. 376. He derives hoctide, the triumph over the Danes, from hoker (derisio), p. 125. He bewails the cutting-down of English words, such as Eovesham and kynning (rex); hence English for the most part had been reduced to monosyllables, a circumstance which gave rise to much complaint about this time. He uses boorne for rivus, p. 260; it had not been commonly employed in Southern England for centuries, except in proper names. He distinguishes between wolde (a bare hill) and wealde (a low woody region), p. 367; the last form had appeared in Caxton. He is inclined to derive ferme (farm), not from the Latin firma, but from the English feormian, pp. 193 and 194. He is particular in writing on live (vivus) in p. 258. He says that pastures in many parts were still called lesewes, p. 393. He revives the old word ordale (ordeal), p. 278. He makes the mistake that manred (the word was not yet extinct) meant the office of leading men, p. 453. The word barow (hillock) seems to have been peculiar to the West Country, p. 392, and is here connected with byrgan (sepelire); it is in truth the old beorg. The Western men, thanks to a legend wrongly applied by Polydore Virgil to St. Thomas and Kent, used to merrily mock "our men of Kent" with being born tailed; foreign nations applied the legend to the whole of England, much to Lambarde's disgust, p. 358.

In 1570 Googe Englished a Latin poem by Naogeorgus; this may be found at the end of Stubbes' 'Anatomy' (New Shakespere Society). The verb bawl, hitherto used of dogs, is now used of men, p. 337. In p. 331 girls are wringing wet, a phrase that we have seen before. In p. 327 palls have labels; this must mean lappel, the flap of a coat.

In 1573 Tusser brought out a second poem, 'Five hundreth pointes of good Husbandrie,' of which no fewer than fourteen editions were printed within two generations. The author, who has a wonderful command of rime, shows marks of his long sojourn in East Anglia, when he uses moether (puella), afterwards to reappear in 'David Copperfield ;' there is the old Anglian hard k in thacker, our thatcher ; lacched (captus) is turned into lagged, p. 86. The vowels are often dropped, as ist (is it), p. 14, reasnable, p. 20, damsen (Damascene), p. 76, vittles, p. 98 ; an adese becomes a nads (adze), p. 36. The old the tone (here followed by the tother) is contracted into tone, p. 145. The a replaces e, as tamper, p. 37. There is slipprie, p. 147, where a later edition keeps the old form slipper. The old neat becomes nettie, our natty, p. 159 ; and Jane becomes Ginnie, p. 181. There is the old spill and the later spoil (perdere) in pp. 60 and 63. The old u is retained in a burrow of rabbits, p. 86 ; the o was set apart for a borough of men ; another form of the old word. The u replaces i, as furzes for firse, p. 119. The old cunnie for cony still remains in p. 86 ; hence perhaps bunny. There are the forms snag dragon and snap dragon in two different editions, p. 96. The form troffe appears for the old trough, p. 36. The two forms waggon and waine occur in one line, p. 35 ; the former comes from Holland. The d replaces t ; the French hotte becomes hod, p. 37. The l is added ; the old verb wrick becomes wrigle, p. 109. The old love of Alliteration comes out in the noun roperipe, p. 133, "a youth ripe for the gallows."

Among the new Substantives are fishdaie, sawpit, a currie combe, brick dust, drover, mouser, walke of sheepe, bore pig, breeder (an ewe), mowle catcher, seede cake, harvest home, hailoft, wake day (village feast), spoone meat, sweete William, p. 96, hollownes, a dible, laier, riddance. The old Gillet (Gilot) once more appears, p. 43. The old Jankin remains in p. 24, coupled with the female Jenikin ; there is Kit (Christopher) in p. 32 ; Tusser's wife, as we see in his will, bore the name of Amye. The old daffodil becomes daffadondilly in p. 95.¹ We know the old form to God ward ; this seems to have given birth to the phrase to Lincolnshire way, p. 103 ; "towards Lincolnshire." We have seen how in the North man stood for a being; in p. 28 stands bakon is the man; we should say, the (right) thing. In p. 43 we hear of Hew Makeshift; we still keep this compound noun; the rogue referred to has a blouse (red-faced wife); hence our blowzy, blown upon by the wind. We read of land out of hart, p. 49; something that impoverishes is called a peeler, p. 84. A man is advised in p. 17 to bridle wild otes fantasie; here is the first mention of the crop cultivated by most English youths, high and low. In p. 108 we read of magget the py; our magpie. In p. 125 barley lies in ill pickle. In p. 137 knacker stands for a harness maker. Udall's coxcombe (stultus) now acquires the further sense of conceit; for he is said to be puffed up with pride, p. 147. In p. 65 the old harvest still stands for Auctumnus. The old word camp (pugna) was in East Anglia set apart for football, as is plain in Lydgate and the 'Promptorium;' Tusser refers to it in p. 60; and this local word, I believe, is still alive. Servants take a snatch (of food) before work, p. 168; this is our snack. Dunbar's word brat has now reached East Anglia, p. 172. In p. 176 we read of ofcorne; that is, corn left to servants; hence our off day (spare day).

"He spake, and the shade of swift-footed Achilles Stalked through the meadow of daffydowndillies."

We have seen runagate; in p. 42 runabout is made an Adjective; runabout prowlers. The comparative worser is coined, p. 143. In p. 104 two synonyms are found in one stanza; the old best cheape and the new cheapest. There is the phrase full South, p. 100. The Southern o thing (one thing) is brought in to rime with nothing, p. 184.

Among the Verbs are outlast, take of (on) trust, hit the time, the weather holds clear. Money is said to burn the bottom of the purse, p. 19. So obsolete had the good old twin (separare) become, that the verb twin is now used for bearing twins, p. 81. The verb eat is employed in a new rustic sense; we are advised to eat etch with hog (turn in hogs to eat it). We overtake work; Tusser overcame it, p. 118. The word lasche (ligula) had appeared in the 'Promptorium;' a farmer may be left in the lash, p. 144; a few years later lurch was to be substituted. The verb lug had hitherto meant vellere; in p. 177 it changes to trahere; to lug in wood. The verb to twifallow land appears in p. 110; a verb compounded with twi had not appeared for Centuries. In p. 206 stands the phrase say what I would, do what I could. In p. 41 stands the best to be got; here able should follow the adjective. In p. 17 we see "laie to keepe from miserie;" here some word like plan or scheme should be the second word. In p. 100 land lies South; here towards seems to be dropped.

Udall's foh becomes fough (faugh) in p. 191. There is the Scandinavian goel (flavus), not the kindred English yellow, p. 98. There is nibble, akin to a Low German word. There is the Celtic verb squat, in our sense, p. 43. There is the Celtic barth (shelter), p. 145; cattle must have warm barth (berth).

Among the Romance words are prime grass, compas (stercus), turkey, sirop, the form artichok, hobbarde de hoy (a youth between fourteen and twenty-one, p. 138), tallie (a score), a pink, abuses, that arise from enclosing, p. 146; this last is a technical word and is not followed by a Noun. There is sampire, p. 94, the herbe the saint Pierre. Timber is seasoned, p. 38; something may serve at a push, p. 79; as sure as thy creede, p. 170. There is the Shakesperian by line and by leavell, p. 101. The word cote is used for a sheep's wool, p. 118. In the same stanza a pun occurs; ungentleness must not be done when shearing sheep, lest gentils (maggots) afflict the animal. The noun dispatch stands for haste, p. 174, and we hear that it hath no fellow. In p. 100 a house is turned up (ornatur); our articles of dress are often turned up with something neat.

Tusser has many proverbs, such as—

"A foole and his monie be soone at debate.
 Christmas comes but once a yeere.
 Who goeth a borrowing goeth a sorrowing.
 To dog in the manger some liken I could.
 March dust to be sold worth ransome of gold.
 Such maister, such man.
 Though home be but homely, home hath no fellow.
 Both beare and forebeare."

In p. 126 an old saw of 1300 is repeated—

We may now consider Gascoign's poems, which range between 1562 and 1577; most of them were composed within five years of the latter date; they may be read in Chalmer's 'English Poets,' vol. ii. The author, our best bard between Surrey and Spenser, was one of the brotherhood of tuneful warriors, and could thus claim fellowship with Æschylus and Camoens. His description of the great fight at Lepanto, couched in long rolling lines, would have rejoiced the heart of Scott; Gascoign must have discussed this glorious theme with his Spanish enemies in Holland, when he was made prisoner. He seems to have been born in Westmorland, and uses the Northern words brat, sakeles (innocent), muck, rock (distaff), grete (cry), fearli (wondrous); he has sample, not ensample; there is the Lancashire to sway the sword.

The u replaces e; Levins' serly becomes surlly, p. 477. The word roy (king) rimes with joy, p. 531. Among Gascoign's new Substantives are fireworks (Turkish engines at Lepanto), p. 495, low water markes, cutthroat, star-conner, overthrow. He is the first English poet, I think, who discusses the gun, which he calls a firelock piece; he speaks of the lock, breech, and bore; see p. 542. He contracts Bartholomew into Batt, p. 513; he makes call a noun, p. 524. He talks of a blocke to make hats on, p. 534. He writes much of the blase of beauty, which often scorched him. He uses swain in its old sense of farm servant, p. 544; at the same time he is the first, I think, to apply the word to a lady's lover, p. 530.

Among Gascoign's Adjectives are blink eyed, empti handed; he applies stale to a jest; a man's English is weak, p. 497; the old feeble was formerly used to express parrvus. There is the old confusion between many and mainé; with a many mo, p. 503, where a is not needed.

Among his Pronouns are poor I, I poor soul; he has the very French idiom, I am no peacock, I, p. 533; he talks of these rimes of mine.

Among his Verbs are bedeck, mellow (of these two he is very fond), dust. He has lay himself wide open, break up house (establishment), beat about the bush, a madding mood, stop your nose, broken sleep, call a conference, make head, hold them play (here we insert in), the day peeps, strike her dead, where the wind sits, break my bank; a gun shoots straight, it came to the pinch. There is the new idiom to like of a thing, p. 503; other verbs were soon to imitate this. We hear of braunfalne arms, p. 506, which must have suggested our later chapfallen. In p. 518 stands make a happy hand (stroke of luck); hence a good hand at cards. In p. 538 the wind took our sail; here the old sense of occupare reappears. A man gathers flesh, p. 541; we say that he puts it on. The poet advises beauty to shut up thy shop, p. 570; I suppose shop is dropped in our common cry, shut up! A soldier may be set on shelf, our verb shelved, p. 522. The phrase to do thee right (justice) is inserted in the middle of a sentence, p. 541. The old Passive Participle holden is altered into held, p. 539; Harlem hath helde out.

Among the Adverbs we remark the new phrase, as brave as brave may be, p. 496; here the Adjective is repeated.

The Dutch words used by this champion of the great Prince of Orange are many. We have padde (our footpad), bulke (in the sense of truncus, p. 490). Gascoign talks of our edell bloetz (lusty gallants), p. 537; hence blood (heros) had appeared fifty years earlier in England. Like Caxton, he restricts Dutchmen to the men of Holland. He puts Dutch words into his verse, when the pilot speaks, p. 537.

There is the Scandinavian dimpled and the endearing Celtic noun peat (pet) addressed to a lady, p. 485.

Among the Romance words are grappling hook, to slice, bumbaste (stuffing of dress), prime of youth, piles (the ailment), bulbeef, models (to represent towns). The new military words are many, as soldado, mustachyos turnde the Turkey waye, p. 537, Lieutenant General, sound a march, relieve watch (guard), fanteries (infantry), bandoliers (soldiers), petronel, a piece (small gun), the recule (recoil). Ladies are addressed as mez dames in the middle of an English sentence, p. 493. We have the Italian gondola and Magnifico, which last rimes with fico in p. 533. A well-known Italian phrase of Ascham's is translated, devils incarnate, p. 534. Gascoign is fond of the Spanish interjection ay me! Shakespere's future ah me! There is metamorphosis; the word horizon is made a dactyl, p. 530. The verb souse, sauce, is used for to wet; souse in a shower, p. 488. The word posie expresses flowers in p. 532, because these were chosen to set forth some motto (poesy). The verb part is used, something like pass; her parting breath, p. 545. There is the phrase, I protest, p. 538, which was to be so common in Goldsmith's Century, like our I declare. A letter of the alphabet appears as double U, p. 534. Gascoign uses the foul term, derived from Bulgaria, as an abusive pun on the Dutch burghers, p. 522; this he must have introduced once more from France, just as it had been already brought over in 1340, without leaving any trace afterwards. French still ruled at cards; we read of sequences all in sute, p. 497.

Gascoign tells us that people went to Bath for the waters, p. 506. He gives us the old saw, every bullet hath a lighting place, p. 518. His experience of our soldiers is much that of Wellington when retreating from Burgos—

“ And God he knowes, the English souldiour's gut
Must have his fill of victualles once a day,
Or else he will but homely earne his pay” (p. 523).

In p. 532 we hear of what is now called an album, in which Gascoign wrote. He uses the Shakesperian alderlievest, p. 536; and a few lines further on he puts en bon gré into the middle of his verse. He often uses Dan (Dominus) in Chaucer's way, and he imitates him further when writing Past Participles like y-wrapte; he talks of “rumbling rime in raffe and ruffe,” p. 544, another obvious imitation. Down to 1590 Chaucer was the one Englishman who reigned in the hearts of all our bards.

Gascoign stands at the head of our English Satirists; his ‘Steele Glass,’ printed in 1576, is a masterly poem in smooth blank verse (I here use Arber's Reprint). He delights in monosyllables; “the most auncient English wordes are of one sillable, so that the more monasyllables that you use the truer Englishman you shall seeme, and the lesse you shall smell of the Inkehorne,” p. 35. He asks in p. 77—

“That Grammer grudge not at our English tong, Bycause it stands by Monosyllaba,
And cannot be declined as others are.”

He is fond of the Old English Alliteration ; see p. 71.

He makes courtier three syllables, p. 71, which is something new. We see Ile for I will, p. 19. The p becomes k ; we have the verb peek as well as peep. He has the new substantive sayler (nauta), p. 79, now one of our commonest words ; and he mentions their “blaspheming oaths ;” he has also a teller of money, p. 80, and the Northern horsecorser. He has Tom Tyttimouse (tomtit), p. 87. The Gods judging aloft are called the heavenly benche, p. 109. Arithmetic embraces evens and odds, p. 77 ; the former word is now first made a substantive. Among the Adjectives are shiftles, morneful, sisterlike. We hear of a lively red (colour), p. 71. An official may have a blinde side, p. 69. Gascoign says alas, the worse my lucke ! p. 50 ; this we now cut down into worse luck ! Among the Verbs are cornfed, take (it) as we find it, bathed with tears, make bones (scruple) to, etc. A man may be cast at heele (disgraced), p. 56 ; hence a dog is called to heel. A man was cast (away) and condemned fifty years earlier ; we now hear of olde cast robes, p. 80. Elyot had roused game ; we now have rowsing verses, p. 46. The verb overreach takes our sense of cheat in p. 77. The verb stalk had hitherto expressed stealthy creeping ; it now expresses a majestic walk ; they go stately stalking on, p. 82.

There is the Scandinavian gloat, p. 96. Among the Romance words are superfinesse, p. 37, consent (concert of music), country squire, pultesse (poultice), May flower. A verse may pass the musters (pass muster), p. 35. There is the phrase strange tale to tell, p. 68 ; an imitation of sooth to say. A gem was set off by leaves (feuilles) of meaner ware ; hence Gascoign talks of a foyle of contraries, p. 54. The foreign cento por cento, referring to interest, comes in p. 71. There are the Greek emphasis, idioma ; monopoly and monark are pronounced in our way, pp. 70 and 74. Gascoign calls the metre, used by “our Mayster and Father Chaucer” in merry tales, riding rime ; but he says that rythme royall is fittest for a grave discourse ; this must mean his own blank verse. Here is a distinction between Teutonic rime and Greek rhythm that Englishmen should always have in mind. Our poet, like his brother of 1303, talks of Sir Simony, p. 72; he has a long allusion to Piers Ploughman, p. 78; he still uses carve in the old way, where we should say cut (secare), pp. 64 and 105. He tells us that truth is truth, p. 103; and that apes' rewards are

Our “monkey's allowance” is slightly different.

The Letters of Gabriel Harvey have been published by the Camden Society; they were written in 1573 and 1579. The a takes the sound of French ê, as bare (ursus); we also see faither written for farther, p. 50. The i stands for eye and line for lain. We see stove for the old stuve. The former serli takes our form surli; it here denotes haughtiness towards inferiors, p. 4. The j replaces d, for dote head becomes joultehead (jolthead), p. 126. There is a wonderful contraction in p. 90, your godbwyes (God be with ye), answering to the French plural adieux; the w was to be struck out later. Among the new Substantives is rise (ascent), p. 69; also dum show, lullaby. Besides godbwyes we hear of a pottle of howdyes (how do ye do), p. 90. It is proposed to have a flynge at Petrarch (attempt to study him), p. 134; hence our “have a shy at,” when proposing to read an author. The word man takes its University sense, a Pembrok Hall man, p. 54. Harvey writes Milord as one word, much as the French do. Something is done by snatches, p. 178; a new phrase. We see it will be meat and drink to him, seavenaclocke dinners, for love or for money, we agree like kattes and dogges. There is the new Adjective waspish. We see a step in the great change which was to replace the old sick by ill—a change against which the Americans still fight; I have been il at ease, and am yet il, p. 168. Something comes next to hande, p. 153; here the next is a new insertion in an old phrase.

Among the Verbs we remark the very old Perfect form sae (vidit), p. 115; this form had not been far from triumphing over our saw. There are the phrases bungle up a book, a meeting breaks up, it goith a begginge (is in no request), p. 67. The new verb blurt is formed from blare (mugire), to blurt out jests, p. 9. Men put up things, p. 48; we now insert with before the last word; in 1630 we were to pocket affronts. A book is run over, p. 51; hence the later run my eye over it. Men know where the shoe pincheth, p. 85; this verb is substituted for Chaucer's wringeth. A hat blows off, p. 144; a curious instance of the transitive becoming intransitive. We stumble on persons (meet them), p. 158. There is the new phrase so much the rather, p. 170. We see the noun hussa (clamor), p. 115, which is German; this did not become common for three generations. We find daggiltayld, p. 125; the first two syllables are Scandinavian, from dagg (dew); we now insert an r into the word from a mistaken analogy.

Among the Romance words are sociable, vagary, comical, acumen, and the adjective schollarlye. A man commences master at the University, p. 2; a new phrase, like turn Protestant. The word cruel is prefixed to another adjective, a cruel cold night, p. 12. We see goodnaturid, p. 59; this was an adjective on which Englishmen prided themselves much about 1660. The participle charming changes its sense and becomes an adjective, a charminge creature, p. 93; this is used by a woman writing to a man. The Participle conceitid is used in our sense, and the usual prefix self is dropped, p. 98. The word crokchet (crotchet) takes the new sense of odd fancy, p. 100. A skape is committed in p. 122; it would now be called an escapade; in the same page the word school is made a transitive verb. There are the phrases for very shame, leave in the lurch; the last word refers to an old French game. Something is written in great Romane letters, p. 99. We hear of a plaudite, p. 129; a curious instance of a Latin imperative being made an English noun; our plaudit. The Spanish appears in bravadoe terms, p. 92. We see periwig, p. 103; this came from peruyk, the Dutch form of the French perruque.

John Hooker, the uncle of the great theologian, was a renowned Devonshire antiquary, who has left much behind him, both printed and in manuscript. His 'Life of Sir Peter Carew' has been published by Mr. Maclean; it was written after 1575. The d is clipped; a ship does not held, but heels, p. 33. The word lot is used in our slangy way, a lot of wasps, p. 49; there is big-boned. We have seen the Irish who but he; Hooker, who at one time lived in Ireland, uses it was who could first land, p. 35. We see stand his friend, blow a gale, drums strike up, p. 108 (this has been extended to other instruments). Among the Romance words are marines (these make up one-seventh of the ship's crew, p. 33), calyvers (soldiers, bearing that weapon). The word bravery is applied to men showing off, not their dress, but their courage (bravado); see pp. 24 and 31. The chief magistrate of a town is called its sovereign, p. 105. We see consider him liberally (a new phrase for appraising and rewarding services), sound the dead sound (our march), scour the sea, from the old discourriour. There is the proverb, the more cooks the worse potage, p. 33.

In Arber's 'English Garner' there are many pieces dating from between 1576 and 1585; among them is the first English Treatise on Dogs. The is is much contracted, as my body's beautiful, iii. 227. The ow replaces oll, a very old usage, as beadrow, p. 246. Among the new Substantives stand setter, turnspit, man-eater. It is remarked that hunde in German, dog in English, is the universal word; but in the latter country hound is a particular and special word; all this distinction cannot date from much earlier than 1450. A well-known name appears as Johnes. We see waggon used for a lady's coach, iii. 248. The word gore (clotted blood) is revived after a long sleep. There is the new Adjective burdenous; the old uplandish still expresses rural; we see the old former feet (fore feet). A Pronoun is employed in a new way, some of ours (our company), i. 135; this is still used of a regiment. Among the Verbs are ride the circuit, get loose, stand upon his guard, intrap, settle myself to marry, v. 293, make an escape. There is a strange compound of the Strong and Weak Participle, ladened, ii. 151. The old Participle holden becomes held, v. 304, as we saw in Gascoign. Women keep pet dogs, to shirk idleness, iii. 247; Mr. Skeat wishes to derive this word from shark, an animal that prowls and slinks from view. The old over all (ubique) is now transposed; certain dogs are rough all over, iii. 261; in ii. 69 stands all the whole and great world over; it is not often that we set the Preposition last.

There are the Celtic nouns penguin, bump. The word sconse (fortress) comes through the Dutch; train oil comes from the Dutch traan (lacryma), which is applied to drops of boiling blubber. Among the Romance words are navigation, specialities, sea soldiers (marines), omni-gatharums (men collected anyhow, ii. 63), master key, a proviso, trail the pike, (serve in war), day-labourer, trifle away time, a foil (used in fencing), house of correction, inhuman (cruel). The word scope had meant aim, something like its Italian sense, about 1530; it now means power; "give free scope to man to utter," i. 472. The line stands for the Equator, p. 133. The English writer of a political treatise in 1576 forestalls the course of events by talking about this British monarchy, ii. 69. The word puppy is used for a lady's toy dog, a Maltese; the word is a connecting link between toy and dog, iii. 247. The verb trace is used for tattoo, v. 251. The word General is used where we should employ Admiral, p. 262. We hear of double double beer, ii. 144; Doctor "Double Ale" had come earlier, and "Double X" was to come later; it is not often that we repeat an adjective for the sake of emphasis, as, "a bad, bad man." In ii. 151 to vent fish is used in the sense of evacuate; it comes from the French fendre (cleave); but it is here confused with vendre (sell). Shakespere uses the word in the former sense ('Tempest,' ii. 2). We hear of the neatness of a man's Latin, iii. 229; this old word for elegantia still survives in our phrase "a neat speech." Among the strange words that were now pouring into England are Kaffirs of Ethiopia, musketa (mosquito), cochineal; Eden's cocus, furican, here become cocoas, huricano. The Ragusye (from the Adriatic town), seen in ii. 67, was soon to become the Argosy. Manchester cottons are specially mentioned as one of our exports, ii. 166. The Scotch still used the old Teutonic rache for a hunting dog, while the English employed the French word brache for a bitch of this breed, iii. 237.

In Ellis' Letters of this time we see a very old Southern form so late as 1577; there was nothing ado (ido), our done, Series ii., vol. iii. p. 56. A feast in a new hall is called a howse warming. In p. 72 London is worse by such a sum; we should insert off after the adjective. In p. 87 a man comes dropping into a chamber. Among the Romance words are deify, the Post letters. In p. 55 stands he is on the mending hande (on the mend). There is the curious phrase, to saphecundit me; a compound verb formed like vouchsafe.

Harrison, a Londoner who held a living in Essex, furnished a 'Description of England' to Holinshed's Chronicle, printed in 1577 (New Shakespere Society). Here the a supplants e, as crafish (crawfish); the e supplants ou, as bitter (bittern) for bitour; the e is struck out, as eft for evete. The b supplants p, as lobstar for lopster. There is the transposition fickle for ficol, i. 168; the k is softened, as in notch for nocke, i. 227; the g is used as well as y; the substantive cledgie appears by the side of claire, the old clæg, iii. 139. We see Brougham in the North written Browham. The d replaces th, as farding. The n is struck out in the proper name Perith, the town. There are such old forms as brickle (brittle), Southerie (Surrey), raise (impetus), former part (fore part), uplandish (rural).

Among the Substantives are swish swash (mixture), flocke-bed, fineness, halfe crowns, upshot, ii. 28; cockhorse (a toy), hardware, blacke lead, tillage. In i. 257 we read of the cutters of plans of towns; hence comes woodcut. The word body stands for nave; the bodie of the church, p. 32. In p. 304 rabbet is opposed to cony, as young to old. In ii. 26 we have six different names for a red deer at six different stages; here the stagon or stag comes before the great stag. The common people still talked of an erne or a gripe, not of an eagle, p. 30. We hear of so many head of cattle, i. 344. A treatise takes up room, p. ix. We hear of the yeeld of fields, iii. 133, a new sense of the old gild. The word bog has at length come down from the North. Harrison lays stress on greatnesse of bone; Shakespere has something like this. In i. 162 men take nuntions after dinner; this word, coming from noon (noon-shenche), was afterwards confused with luncheon. The old Somerset now becomes Summersetshire. In p. 206 a Welshman is called a David (Taffy). The word brunt (impetus) now seems to mean stress; the chief brunts of service, iii. 150. In p. 352 Bath is said to stand in a bottom (vallis); this sense still survives in the names of places, as Bullock's Bottom. There is the noun of measurement, hundred weight, ii. 4, which is always used in the singular. The word home seems to stand for patria, p. 13; the Orchades are opposed to some place nearer home. The word woodman stands for venator, p. 26. Certain goods are adulterated by crafty Jackes, p. 56; hence Jack of all trades. Chaucer's belous now becomes bellowses; we also hear of Dianaes, a new Plural.

Among the Adjectives are hurtful, seafaring. Our "toy dogs" are seen as toiesh curs, p. 49. We read of headie ale, i. 295, a new sense of the adjective.

Among the Verbs are rise up to honour (here we drop the up), prick a sheriff, shoe leather holds out water, poison works, home made articles, home-born, eat up the country, eat down grass, roads cross each other. The verb run is applied in a new sense; a range of hills runs in a certain direction. The verb engrave is used of portraits, p. 356. The verb have now implies affirmation; a learned man would have a certain Roman road to cross a river, iii. 145. The word purpose is now first followed by an Infinitive; furniture is brought of purpose to be hidden, i. 253. Certain records are not to be had, p. 311; here I suppose possible is understood; easy to be had occurs elsewhere. Cheese cateth mellow, ii. 8; here the steps must be, is in eating, is eating, eateth.

There is a new idiom of Pronouns; anie matter whatsoever, i. 101; here it be is dropped at the end. In iii. 139 oughts (a new Plural) stand for any things; in our day oughts are confined to arithmetic. The old Adverb over all (ubique) stands in i. 143; at this moment it was giving way to the transposition all over. In ii. 10 stands he wrote over (the sea) for it. There is the very old Adverbial by dropmeales, p. 58. The old at the least way yields to at leastwise, i. 303; whence the future leastways. The at is dropped in he will be home again, p. 293. There is a new use of to in the phrase to this effect (bearing this meaning), iii. 141. We had long used about London, expressing neighbourhood; Harrison has about us (our neighbourhood), ii. 55.

We see pettie fogger of the law, i. 206; this strange word is the Dutch focker, a monopolist. There is the Scandinavian verb palter, p. 209, to change or shuffle.

Among the Romance words are versify, seisure, stover, extant, limpet, the shingles, flask (for powder), pard, a fooles cap, soda, bulb, screw, matted, able (skilful), an estimat. We find riveret, iii. 160, our later rivulet; there is corint (currant), i. 131. Harrison writes sufficiëntlie liberall, i. 151, where the first word means valdè; this long word is still in use. Our old phrase the gentles makes way for the gentry, p. 354. We see mansion house, p. 237, which is here applied to dwellings in a street. There is the word bodger (a dealer), p. 302, which had been written badger for the last eighty years; butter badgers are still in being; the word comes from bladier, an engrosser of corn. There is much about the constitution of our bodies, iii. 151; the long word is made Plural in p. 155. In i. 9 platform stands for an engraved sketch in a topographical work. A topic is passed over to others, p. 355. We light upon Belgie (the later Belgium), and Danske (Denmark), ii. 31.

Harrison talks of his synchroni or time fellows (contemporaries), iii. 131. He gives the derivation of saffron from the Arabic zahafaran, ii. 52; the growers of this in England were called crokers, from crocus.

He tells us much about the English Church in his day; he describes the Propheisies just introduced, which appear to have been clerical meetings, with laymen as listeners, i. 17. There seems to have been no intoning in Cathedrals, p. 30; the stained glass was allowed to remain in most churches, as the replacing it with white glass would be costly, p. 31. A little tabernacle of wainscot (the reading desk) was provided for the minister in the body of the church. Harrison declares that the English Bishops were the most learned in Europe, p. 64; this was allowed by many of the Papal party, p. 111. All the clergy appointed since 1563 knew Latin, an improvement on the old state of things. Peter Martyr had expressed his astonishment at the vast endowments of the English Universities, p. 71; Oxford excelled in fine colleges; Cambridge in uniformity of building and good government, p. 73; the tutorial system is referred to, p. 78. Harrison disliked medical men going to study in immoral Italy, p. 81; he calls Dr. Turner the father of English physic, p. 352. A Lieutenant was set in time of necessity over every shire, p. 99. Our author bemoans the high prices, ever rising, in spite of England's increased traffic, p. 131; wheat bread was a luxury for the rich only. There was just as much work scamped in his day as in ours, p. 136. Men took two meals only, dinner and supper, p. 162; each class had its own hour for eating. The Halifax guillotine is described in p. 227. Three things had changed within living memory; chimneys, bedding, and plate had been multiplied to a great extent, p. 239. Henry VIII. had been his own architect, and had wonderfully improved the English style of building, p. 267. Every one of our villages could turn out at least three or four soldiers, p. 280; the nobles kept great armouries. Foreigners allowed that English ships were the best in the world for strength and speed, p. 288. One of the Queen's ships was named the Dread nought, a name still in use, p. 289. Parks and warrens abounded, p. 303; the fallow deer were kept in by oak palings; these enclosures were hurtful to tillage and checked population. It was an almost unheard-of thing to sell game, p. 305. Harrison longed to see Sunday markets put down, p. 344. The common folk spoke of the Roman coins dug up, by the names of dwarf's money, fairy groats, Jews' money, and other foolish titles, p. 360. All mints, except the Tower, were suppressed in Harrison's day. There was much roguery in horse-dealing, ii. 4. English brawn was held a rare treat in foreign parts; an odd story is told in p. 10 of certain Jews in Spain being seduced to eat it, taking it to be fish. The plenty of English households is contrasted with the meagre fare of foreigners, p. 14. The fox and badger were preserved by the gentry for sport, p. 24; beavers lingered in the Teifie river alone, p. 25. Harrison gives us certain useful rimes—

“Thirtie daies hath November,
 Aprill, June, and September,
 Twentie and eight hath Febuarie alone,
 And all the rest thirtie and one,
 But in the leape you must ad one” (p. 97).

Some rimes, little differing from these, have come down to our day. The soil had been of late years wonderfully improved by the farmers; Wales in particular had made rapid strides, and her common folk no longer lived by thieving, iii. 131. Cardigan was the best pasture ground in the realm, p. 132.

Stanyhurst was a native of Dublin, who wrote the ‘Description of Ireland,’ published in Holinshed’s ‘Chronicle,’ in 1577; to the same pen is due the ‘History of Ireland in the time of Henry VIII.’ Our chronicler remarks, p. 2, that the English used dyle (the Scotch de’il) for devil. He inserts w, forming twatler from tattler; hence our twaddler. He adds l to the old gabbe and shove, forming gabble and shuffle. He has quakemire instead of Palsgrave’s quavemire. As to Substantives, he has a self-liking, man of straw, shuffle board, throw (at dice), pot revels (hence pothouse), bondslave, carpet knight, markeman (soldier). In p. 114 stands he was hail fellow well met. The word hotspur is used as a substantive in p. 178. The word hagler here means a wanderer; our present sense of the word comes from Palsgrave’s verb huck; higler was to come later. The old quellour still stands for killer, and buxomness for courtesy. The word crue, losing its honourable meaning, expresses no more than turba, and is used of robbers, p. 13. The author foreshadows our in the nick of time, using the nick of his purpose; Lambarde had used nick of battle. So many shot (marksmen) are levied in p. 111; we still talk of a good shot. In p. 13 we read of a set race of horses; one of the first instances, I think, of a horse race under that name.¹ We find tagge and rag, cutte and long tayle, p. 13; for the two last we now substitute bobtail. There are the phrases his room is better than his company, birds of one feather. Among the Adjectives are broad pronunciation, barebrick brats, be as good as his word. A man is said to be in talk short and sweet, p. 19.

Among the Verbs are fether his nest, I am led to believe, sharpe set (hard driven), make a sour face at, give his word (promise), to dish, a far reaching man. There is the Shakespearean he will bear no coles in quarel, p. 113. The verb grovel is coined from Joy's supposed Participle groveling, which was, in truth, the adverb gruflinge, grovelinge (supinus), p. 29. The verbs slink and sneak, the old snican, reappear in books after a slumber of centuries. In p. 108 stands book up complaints; this verb had not appeared since 1220. There is the curse, be hanged, p. 154. The author, like Shakespere, is fond of prefixing be to verbs.

There is the Dutch verb snip, the Celtic shamrock and bard; this last had been already mentioned by Scotch authors.

Among the Romance words are defalk (secare) to iterate, mounterbanck, ironical, to eternize, suitably, to rate (fix), mis-date, faultfynder, shock (in battle), parlee (in war), a mandatum, the cream of experience. Cicero's father is called the olde gentleman, p. 4; a phrase long afterwards seriously applied by Ockley to the renowned Caliph Omar. We are told that the men of Fingall, great husbandmen, are nicknamed collonnes, from the Latin colonus, to which the clipped word clown answers, as Stanyhurst thinks, p. 3. A man is called a clownish curmudgeon, p. 103. We hear of a knave in grain, p. 13. The kernes are called the Devil's black garde, p. 28. A baneret differs from a baronet, p. 24; the latter was known in Ireland. The noun suit, coined from sue, now itself becomes a verb; suit her with it, referring to clothes. A man, famous for cavilling sophistry, is called a Duns. There is the phrase to hackney a horse, p. 10; also cry them acquitaunce (quits), p. 14.

We are told that the old Chaucer English was preserved at Wexford and in Fingall; they here still talked of attercop (aranea) and leache (medicus). Some Irish words are remarked upon as like Latin, as salle (salt); the explanation of this was to lie hidden for the two next Centuries. The English good morrow was one of the foreign phrases borrowed by the Irish; Stanyhurst says that it means "God give you a good morning!" p. 3. The Irish had no word for knave, p. 4. They placed I before he, as I and he; the courtesy of English, it is remarked, is clean contrary, p. 28, (ego et rex meus).

Stanyhurst brought out his translation of Virgil's first four Æneids in 1582, employing English hexameters (Arber's Reprint). This Dublin poet has been called, not a well of English undefiled, but the common sewer of the language; he burlesques Virgil most amusingly but unintentionally. A few other poems of his are here added. Our author, who is peculiar in his spelling, clips his Vowels, as tward (toward), thart (thou art), wasd (was it). He sometimes inserts them, as monsterus, p. 50; he is fond of ie for i, as liefe; he replaces o by ow, as lowbye, p. 92; also ow by oa, changing the sound, as floane (flown). He is fond of repeating words with a change of vowel; we have pit pat, yolp yalp, swish swash. The be is clipped in twixt (inter), p. 92. The ph replaces the true English f in pheere (socius), p. 20. The p replaces c, as sept (gens) for sect; this word for clan was to be much used in Ireland. The c is inserted in fructles, imitating the Latin; the g appears in gnible, perhaps to connect it with gnaw, p. 3. The t is clipped in craven for the old cravant, p. 95; the d is inserted in viadge and adge; it is replaced by l in quillity for quiddity. The laddebord of 1360 becomes larboard. The l is added to form the verb fondle. The old crash seems to give birth to clash, p. 51; it is here used of armour. The z replaces s in the verb raze in the same page. There are variations of the position of letters, as pusiaunt (puissant), sprited (spruted), argosye (Ragusa). In p. 33 thee godes

(the goddess) forms a dactyl; a curious way of sounding the definite Article; in p. 78 godesesse (Divæ) is made an anapæst.

Among the new Substantives are haulmoone, mopsy (darling), hilltop, sea rowme, dogstar, slag, hudwinck (deception), eyebal. We see recknings, in the Plural, from Eden's maritime verb reckon, p. 30. Dido is called an unhappy being, p. 42; Gower had used this Verbal noun. The word tools represents arma, p. 63. The word spirt, p. 85, stands for breve spatium, which is something new; it had hitherto meant leap or start. We see freak, p. 114; there was an Old English frician (saltare). In p. 136 stands flye boat; this word, used of the swift vessels of pirates, gave birth to the Spanish filibuster. The word play takes its secondary sense of gambling, p. 153; in the same page we hear of losing the mayne (main stake). In p. 3 we read of such cheate poetes; we have seen chete stand for res in Awdeley; the phrase must mean "poets of such a sort." Stanyhurst is fond of compound nouns, such as storm-bringer, a hope-lost (desperate ruffian), makebate, byrth soyl, graveporer (old man ready to be buried); Scylla is called a wreck-make. Our author had elsewhere connected race with horses; he now has racebrood, p. 93. The starved Achæmenides appears as a shrimp, a leane rake, a skrag, p. 89; Ascanius is a slip, a word hitherto applied to plants, p. 97. Rustics are called hoblobs, p. 99. A swaggering warrior is a cutter, p. 143; hence one of Cowley's plays was to take its name. In p. 154 we read of every Tom Tyler (common fellow), like our Smith or Jones. Young pigs are hoglings in p. 83, hogrels in p. 96. Among the Adjectives are thick-leaved, swallo-like, mutterus, thunderus, matchless, brasse-bold, thickskym, flashy. Our author is fond of compounding adjectives in us (ous). The word haggard, said to be derived from hag, and to be confused with the French hagard (wild), is applied to a storm in p. 29, and must here mean rigidus, as it does in Lyly. The old godlic had appeared as godly for the last Century; but godlyke is once more coined in p. 37 to express the hero's beauty. The word cutting is used as an Adjective (mordax) and applied to destiny, p. 111. The word daring (audax) appears for the first time, I think, p. 143. The serpents embrace Laocoon with wig wag circuled hooping, p. 50; hence the later wiggle waggle. Anchises addresses his mates as my deere feloes, p. 88. We have a foretaste of Milton in p. 142; boozom deboynar usage is applied to a lovely paragon.

In p. 48 Æneas, mentioning Sinon, calls him my yooncker, "the youth of whom I talk;" this is something like Ascham's new use of your.

Among the Verbs are nick (cut short, p. 22), sea-tost, top (overtop) a man, to shower, draw a covert, thunder out oaths, to wanton, to hammer (out) words, keep rank. We see find a horse nest, p. 14; here we now change the animal's gender. The en and be are often prefixed to verbs, as enshore and bedaub; this Shakespere was to imitate. The winds under the charge of Æolus rowze forward or back, p. 19; this is the Old English hreošan (ruere); hence may come the word rooge (scuffle), still in use at Eton. The word doom is used as a verb, p. 14; the old form was dem-an. The verb hem means arctare; frost hems a river, p. 135; hence the later hem in. The word flirt keeps its transitive sense in p. 84; but in p. 31 bees flirt (flutter about). In p. 40 we hear of a speaking forgery; this word for lifelike we still apply to a picture. A man bellows, p. 44; hitherto the word had been used of animals only; the Cyclops brays and bells, p. 92. The Trojans croud to their leader, p. 70; here the verb becomes intransitive; the verb choke does the same, p. 97. Dido is sweltred in anger, p. 115; and the Trojans are besweltred with the seas, p. 34; here the word becomes transitive. The verb huff (bluster) appears in p. 132, coming from the Interjection huffu! Juno is to cut of (stop) al quarrels, p. 27; hence our cut off a retreat. The verb sail imitates come; they are sayled, p. 49. The verb anear (approach) is coined; hence our come anigh me. An Imperative is dropped in p. 66; now, no lingring! The curious Participle holpt stands in p. 52, a mixture of holpen and helpt; there is also yrented (laceratus), p. 89. The verb betake (committere) is utterly mistaken; it stands for capere in p. 52. Rocks are drumming with floods, p. 87;

this seems to be a Participle, but it must stand for in drumming.

There is the new Adverb maynelye, p. 56; smacklye is coined in p. 40 to express Dido's kisses, smacklye bebase thee.

The for is used in a betting sentence; my life for an haulfpenye (it is so), p. 44.

Among the Interjections are hullelo! said to be squeaked by the Nymphs, p. 100; also ogh, p. 116; taratantara expresses the trumpet's sound, p. 53. In p. 99 stands loa, behold ye! an ancestor of our lo and behold!

The Scandinavian words are rustle, tipsy; their baldare (streptus) appears in p. 108, which may have had its influence on balderdash.

The words akin to Dutch and German are fluke (of an anchor), pipkin, to ravel, to skew; dorp stands for a cottage in p. 31.

The Celtic words are spunk for fires, to hawk (in the throat), to cotton (agree), p. 19. There is the ill-omened cossherye, p. 40. In p. 89 we see pouke bug; the latter syllable is an English corruption of the former, the Welsh and Irish puca.

Among the Romance words are peale meale (pell mell), to ferret, to tower, to troupe, plaguy, authoress (the old auctrice), peremptory, a directory, taskwork, pallet, ful sized, omen, a catche (advantage, p. 97), contrye seat, disordered, gally slave, villainous. There are the more learned words epitheton, emphatical, prosodia. We see the Italian complemento, p. 10; it was soon to lose the last letter; there is the Spanish bourracho. Pedigree is written petit degree, p. 14; one of the many wild guesses at the source of this word; men drink a bon viage to their friends, p. 81; sanglier appears. A lady is called a brave Brownnetta (brunette), p. 141. The word pandar is used in its evil sense, p. 139. Anchises addresses his juniors as you lustye juventus, p. 64; there was an old play so named. The word brace had hitherto been used of animals; in p. 23 we read of a brace of rocks. The Latin currus appears as coach and wagon, p. 33; bellatrix is Englished by baratresse, p. 34. Calchas is gaymed (won over), and an answer is coyned, p. 46. An error may be grosse, p. 82. Virgil's Fama is called a bagage, p. 101, the French bagasse. The seas ring with cheering clamorous hoyssayle, p. 109; here the Participle is on its way to a new sense. Tears gutter in p. 111; this we now apply to a candle only. In p. 129 we hear of men of state; these were soon to become statesmen. A rock is deep dented, p. 28; here an old Teutonic word is confused with the Latin dens. The two forms repeal (repel) and repulse may be seen in p. 58.

Stanyhurst uses such old words as sib (cognatus), bagd (tumens), frith in frithcops, p. 32, quernstoan, gadling, take (committere, p. 29), agryse, threp, flockmeal, namely (præcipuè). There are old forms like habil (able), take the travayle (trouble, p. 118), i-composed, ne (nec). Virgil's words are Englished by such terms as karne (miles), coystrel, Bocardo (prison), Tyburn, Skarboro warning, Bedlam, limbo; Iarbas calls Dido a coy tib; Æneas' son is a cockney dandiprat hophthumb; the hero is a tarbreeche quystroune; Priam is ducked in his son's blood.

Stanyhurst says that it is wrong to write sound for sown, p. 11; he pronounced orator, auditor, magistrate, graund-mother, as we do; according to him, our present pronunciation of imperative, cosmographie, and orthography is wrong. He remarks on the curious fact that the long word peremtorie is accented on the first syllable, p. 13. He has a pun in p. 103—

He attempts the Pentameter, with very poor success, in p. 127. He was the first, I think, to write English Sapphics, p. 131.

Stephen Gosson in 1579 brought out his ‘School of Abuse’ (Arber's Reprint), directed against the Theatres, which had sprung up in London about five years earlier. He writes lets for let us, and adds l to Palsgrave's verb snar; the old snarl (illaqueare) had long been extinct. He has the Substantives head maister, boorder (lodger), hangebye (hanger on, p. 40), quackesalver (one who cackles about his salves); Wycherley was to use only the first syllable of the word.

The flats and sharps in music appear in p. 28 ; also streines (cantus) in p. 68. The author talks of a rough cast, where the adjective takes a new meaning, not exact, p. 24 ; we read of a free horse, p. 58 ; our free goer. There is slovenly (obscænus), p. 40. A fashion was now coming in of prefixing an adjective to self ; your sweete selves, p. 58. Among the Verbs are bring to (on) the stage, guns go off, chaulk out the way, run a woolgathering, keep his fingers in ure (practice) ; we now drop the ure. In p. 64 stands ward a blow ; here the verb no longer means custodire, as it did a dozen years earlier. The author lets out invective, p. 5 ; here we now suppress the noun. Liberty gives us head, p. 24 ; we now give a horse his head ; the head here may mean impetus, as in Tarleton. A ship of old was manned ; now ladies are manned (escorted) home, p. 35 ; I have lately seen the phrase to beau you about. Men sit rente free, p. 36 ; sit had meant habitare in Old English, and land-sittend had been a term for a tenant.

Among the Romance words are theatre, to discifer, shorte commons, cochman, bowling allye, armour of proofe, poyns of warre sounded. We know our kennel of a street, which here appears as chanell (canalis). Certain women are called hackneies, p. 66 ; a foretaste of our garrison hacks. In the same page stuffe seems to slide into the meaning of nonsense ; what stuffe is this? Foxe had talked of blanch stuff.

Some of Gosson's lines, pp. 76-78, are written in a smooth flowing metre that Pope would have approved. Our author has the well-known saws—“ Great cry and little wool (anent hog-shearing) (p. 28).

Every John and his Joan (p. 35).
It is not good jesting with edge toles” (p. 57).

John Lyly brought out his ‘Euphues’ in 1579 and 1580 ; it was at first the delight of all England ; it then became a laughing-stock ; and in our own day it has regained somewhat of its old popularity ; I have used Arber's Reprint. The good Teutonic diction is in startling contrast to Scott's caricature of the work.

We see the mistake of Syren for Siren in p. 39 ; even Thackeray, a classical scholar who should have known better, repeats this in his writings. What Lambarde calls the weald now appears as the wylde of Kent, p. 268. The old verb glow changes its sound and becomes gloe, p. 286. The u replaces i in rumple, p. 443. The old gat-toothed becomes gagge toothed, p. 116. The n is clipped, for limn (pingere) appears as limm, p. 449.

Among the new Substantives are finenes (formed from fine), chilnesse, fore-leg, pot-herb, stoppe (pause); we see cocke of the game, p. 106, whence, perhaps, comes the cock of a school, a short cut (passage), p. 198, shrowding sheete, whence must have come Foxe's restricted use of shroud, the white (mark at shooting), a sweete tooth in his head, p. 308, not the bredth of a haire, fludes of teares, be in thy (good) bookes. The old drench (potus) is now restricted to the cure of a horse's ailments, p. 203. The old sea term a kenning is cut down to a ken in p. 250; on the other hand, within foure houres sayling (sail) of stands in the same page. A lady may utter scriches, p. 303. The word byte is used in the angler's sense, p. 392. We see other newes is none, p. 470, where the Singular verb follows the Plural noun. There is wittall (wittol), p. 132, which is said to come from the bird wood wale, like cuckold from cuckoo; see Skeat. We hear of the withers of a horse, p. 249, the part which the beast sets against (with) his load; there is the German widerrist, meaning the same. We read much of wit in this book; wit delights, wisdom instructs, p. 407; the Italians prefer a sharp wit to sound wisdom, p. 389; wit and wantonness seem to run in couples, pp. 280 and 286.

There are the new Adjectives chill, p. 420, watchfull, (averse to sleep), p. 142. We see thy sweete sake, as busie as a bee, too mylde a worde, hasill eyes, go slipshad. Adjectives are applied in new senses, as a slippery pranke, a broad jest, adle braines, a forward season. The word giddy, p. 448, takes the new sense of dizzy. The word foul now begins to be applied to play, foule gamesters, p. 289. Lyly is fond of using pretty.

The my, as before, is coupled with the Vocative; my good Camilla, p. 366. A letter is subscribed thine ever in the same page; also thine to commaunde, p. 383. There is but more of this, with no verb, p. 390; the construction is changed in more I cannot promise, p. 302. Lyly employs the phrase nearest way, but he has also the old next way, p. 288.

Among the Verbs are match (marry) low, a made marriage, play false, pin a man to her sleeve (tie to her apron strings), give a sigh, more afraide than hurte, a hooked nose, he was left poore (by his father), rub my memorie, put me out of conceipt, make a full poynt (stop), to fit close, know the length of his foot, take measure of it, take him up short, wish him farther off, no worse than I wish him, think well of, there is no harm done, wring him on the withers, get the starte, put in hir spoke into the wheele, lay salt on a bird's taile. In p. 35 we remark the close connexion between suck and soak, soake his pursse. A new form for expressing oportet is often repeated here; I am to thanke you, p. 40; in p. 393 thou wast to have stands for "thou must have had." The Past stands for the present; might I be so bold as to, etc., p. 252. The two forms of the Future are contrasted in p. 283; wit will not (live without a husband), vertue shall not. The two forms melten and melted, Participles, stand in one line, p. 183. In p. 287 she was going stands for cæpit vadere. In this Century the old prefix for was being supplanted by over; overworn stands in p. 44. A man may lose himself in a labyrinth, p. 462; a new phrase. In p. 58 a broken bone is set together; we now drop the last word. The verb hoard had been asleep since the days of the 'Ayenbite'; Lyly, who was a Kentish man, revives the word in a bad sense, he that hoordeth, p. 192; in p. 435 he opposes "treasurers for others" to "horders for themselves." A lady commeth in hir silkes, p. 193; we should insert out after the verb. In p. 246 men picke thy minde out of thy hands; that is, guess thy fancies from thy gestures; hence comes our pick his brains. Manning's he nyghetede becomes he was benighted, p. 251. We hear of the shadowings (colours) invented by painters, p. 352; hence came shades of colour; the verb shaddow stands for pingere, p. 255, our shadow forth. Men see wit, p. 269; hence to see a joke. A lady says that to make love is a phrase that belonged to her lover's shop board, since he meant to make an art or occupation of love, p. 290. The verb dare adds the meaning of provoco to that of audeo, and now first appears in the Passive voice; he cannot suffer to be dared by any, p. 316. The physician's phrase strike a vein appears in p. 329; here it refers to the body, later it was used of minerals; hence, strike ile. A man boords a lady when talking, p. 332; a future Shakesperian phrase. There is our indefinite phrase fruit, grape, and I know not what, p. 366. In p. 430 stands have an eye to the mayne; here Nash was soon to add chance. There is a new shade of meaning in understand, p. 419; in certain pictures there was more understoode than painted; something was perceptible to the mind, not to the eye. People are out-tripped in a race, p. 419; hence the future corrupt word outstrip ten years later.

Among the Prepositions stands you are deceived in me. We saw think to himself in the year 1440; we now have smile to himself, blush to myself; the to supplants Udall's old by, in the next doore to a creple, p. 131. There is too many by one, p. 271; elsewhere there is Heywood's one too many, p. 50. In p. 246 stands presume of the courtesies; this of was later to become on, the usual interchange. Countries had earlier marched to each other; Kent now marches upon the sea (is bordered by it), p. 247.

We see the Scandinavian crabbe (apple), also the word pat; hit a thing pat, p. 296; this is the English pat (ferire) confused with the Dutch pas (aptus); the latter comes from the French se passer; see Skeat.

Among the Romance words are relish, laity, injurious, table talke, to proyne (prune), mockerie, liniaments, paper flowres, incomparable, touchwood, consist in, byas, promonterie, respect him, have his recourse to, a cane (for striking), p. 381, petroleum, cabish (cabbage). What we call a bad debt is a desperate debt in p. 273. The word pipe now means vox; strayn his olde pype, p. 278; strains of music had only just appeared in English. The word courtesy, when used of ladies, was being debased to the meaning of wantonness, pp. 286 and 299 ; women may be compliant in an evil sense. We learn that England is the picture of comeliness, p. 312, a new sense of the word. The word profession stands for a learned man's occupation, p. 436. We hear of a good constitution of bodye, p. 329 ; the two last words were soon to be dropped. A great distinction is drawn in p. 353 between courting ladies and loving them. A man consters a lesson to a lady, and she listens to his construction, p. 362. The word piety means natural affection in p. 103 ; it is sundered from pity, its rival form, in p. 338. In p. 105 carde stands for a medical prescription. Instruments are touched (sounded), p. 473. The word jest seems to imply immodesty in p. 474, just as in the New Testament jesting is said to be not convenient. We learn that braverie in its earliest sense is something far below beauty, p. 35. We call certain events "a bitter pill;" the first use of pill in this sense appears in p. 468. The word sot (stultus) had long been dropped ; it crops up again in this sense in p. 46, and takes the new meaning of ebrius in p. 38 ; there is also the new sottish (stolidus), p. 40. A silent man is called a cipher, p. 46. A person is contracted (in marriage), p. 470. We hear of a crew of gentlewomen, p. 51 ; the word bears its most honourable sense at the moment it was about to be debased. The word gallant expresses formosus in p. 51. The word conceit seems by the previous sentence to mean self-respect in p. 51 ; a lady can dash a man out of conceit, p. 51. We read of a straight (strait) accompete, p. 181 ; but also of strictnesse of life, p. 188. The word coy seems to settle down into its sense of modest dignity in p. 299. The word precise occurs often ; it is applied to holiness and to manners ; this quality is inferior to modesty, p. 407 ; if a girl is witty without being wanton, she is thought precise, p. 280. The word reliques loses its old religious meaning, and may stand for the scraps of a feast, p. 234. Men now convey money by deed, p. 234. A good complection, p. 405, refers to the body, and not as before to the mind. An old sense of train appears in p. 392 ; birds are trayned (allured) ; perhaps this had some influence on the later phrase draw in. In p. 371 mistres is applied to a girl, not to a matron. A lady is sick of the solens (sullens), p. 285 ; something like "a fit of the blues." The vocative Gentleman is often used at the beginning of a sentence. A child calls its mother Mamma, p. 129. A lady is of great perfection in body, p. 185 ; hence the later "she is perfection." We hear of a Madame of the court, p. 220. Hampole's old verdite appears as verdict, p. 438. There is the phrase I am provided (furnished), p. 136 ; it is here used of an orator, ready with his matter ; but I have heard this phrase in the North when a guest has enough on his plate. We see quarellous, p. 145, where Shakespere was soon to alter the ending. The source of fowling piece is in p. 456 ; peeeces to fowle. We see sympathia in p. 46, which becomes simpathy in p. 48 ; there is the Plural axiomes, p. 100 ; type (pattern), diapason.

Lyly has some well-known saws, as faint hart neither winneth castell nor lady, p. 364, the weakest must still to the wall, p. 53, the spaniel, the more he is beaten, the fonder he is, p. 109, youth will have his course, p. 124, mariages are made in heaven, p. 471, comparisons seeme odious, p. 68, the greatest wonder lasteth but nine daies, p. 205. In p. 215 stands as lyke as one pease is to another. There is the Old English alliteration, wooe hir, win hir, and weare hir, p. 307. Lyly, in his balanced sentences, is a forerunner of Dr. Johnson. He abounds in puns, as on the verb undo, p. 471, on sunne and sonne, p. 281, on the verb straw, p. 399, on mate, p. 66. There was an old saw, p. 439, "all countries stande in neede of Britaine, and Britaine of none." God, it seems, looked upon England as a new Israel, His chosen and peculiar people, p. 451 ; this passage I commend to our eagle-eyed Anglo-Israelites. The great sin of England was, not drink, but variableness of fashions, p. 437. Lyly names Padua and Wittenberge as the chief Universities of Italy and Germany, p. 140 ; he was at both Oxford and Cambridge, preferring the former for its stately colleges, the latter for its sumptuous houses (in the town), p. 436. He says that English ladies do not resemble their Italian sisters, who begin their morning at midnight, and make their evening at midnight, p. 442. There is in one page, 451, both the old title, the Ladie Marie, and the new title, the Princes Marie. The Lord Mayor of London is thought to fare better than any at table, p. 437. Lyly has old words like wem, spil (perdere), forslow (negligere), hab nab, triacle (remedium). He has the following phrases that had only just appeared in English, main (at dice), clownish, waxe haile fellow (familiar), sharp set, overreach (decipere), to parle, cry quittance, manne (comitari), haggarde (rigidus), p. 114.

Sir Philip Sidney's 'Sonnets' belong to 1581 or thereabouts (see Arber's 'English Garner,' i. 467). The poet follows the fashion of the age by prefixing be to verbs, as becloud, bedim. He has the new phrase of his day, a shield of proof, and the verb hackney. The new Substantives are horsemanship, lambkin; there is selfness, p. 533, meaning "devotion to a man's own interests;" this is not very far from the future selfishness. There is the sea phrase, a lee shore, p. 552. As to the Adjectives, the ending ish is making way, as boyish, tigerish; there is also dovelike. We see the old forþmest revived as foremost, p. 574. The thorough had been made an adjective a hundred years earlier; we now find thoroughiēst, p. 531. The old þryffete is revived in three-foot stool, ii. 179. Sidney is fond of prefixing an Adjective to a Pronoun, as foolish I, poor me, lovely she; there is also your silly self, p. 544, a new phrase of the time. Another novelty is you tyrant you! p. 567. Among the Verbs are life-giving, unfelt, hell-driven, give the lie to. Lines are dashed (blotted out), p. 528; in our time they are dashed off, a curious change of meaning. The word beg loses its piteous sense, mendicare; I beg no subject, p. 517, shows the milder shade of meaning petere. Transitive verbs become intransitive, as toss and fry. There is a very old form of the Strong Perfect, thou flew, p. 565; but the verb should end in e. As to Adverbs, Sidney revived eke, which had been dropped for nearly 200 years. The adverb is governed by a preposition, as ere now. We have seen far more; we now find far too long, p. 531. Bells are rung out, ii. 193. There is the new man at arms, where at supplants of, p. 523. Wickliffe had prefixed in to many Teutonic words, copying the Latin ; Sidney has infelt, p. 533 (what is felt within a man's breast). There is the old welaway (wa la wa), where Shakespere was soon to alter the last syllable. We see the Scandinavian verb purl. Among the Romance words are lustre, eagle-eyed. Sidney, like other writers of this time, uses merely for omnino, p. 575. The Participle abstracted is applied to the mind, p. 516. We see that a full point ended a sentence, p. 530. There is the substantive caustic, p. 513.

In another work Sidney uses the phrase another-gaines husband ; this must be the Northern anotherkins. Lyly, rather later, talks of another-gates marriage. In the next Century, Howell was to write anothergets and another-guess. Sidney, moreover, uses affectation in our sense of the word, implying hollow assumption ; he has also artist. About this time the French law term prepense seems to have been Englished, for we see malice forethought ; the Old English adjective foreponcl had been long dropped. The word almighty was the only old Adjective compounded with all that time had spared ; but new compounds, such as all-merciful, now begin to be formed on the old model. The verb accompany is now connected with music. For this last paragraph, see the words in Dr. Murray's Dictionary.

About this time the oo was pronounced much as we sound it now ; au was pronounced in the German way ; see Ellis on Pronunciation.

Barnaby Riche brought out his 'Farewell to Militarie Profession' in 1581 (Shakespere Society). The i replaces e, as hippes, coupled with haws, p. 28. Gresham's dallor becomes doler, p. 217. The sound of o was encroaching on that of u ; we see bloes (ictus) in p. 151. The u replaces o, as benumbed, p. 181. The printer was puzzled by the new foreign word mustachio, and prints it muschato, p. 200. There is the new Substantive belvynger. The word horne-pipe means no longer a song, but a dance, p. 5. A father uses the scornful term houswife to his daughter, p. 200 ; this was to become hussy one generation later. The name Joan bore a contemptuous sense that was to last for nearly 200 years ; a badly dressed girl is called Jone of the countrey, p. 222. As to Adjectives, narrow is applied to an escape, p. 32. We read that traffic has become dead, p. 11; a new sense of the word. The word dry is connected with nursing; to drie nurse a child, p. 185. A leader wishes to know what is in a soldier; here the word stuff must be dropped after the pronoun. Among the Verbs stand tread a measure, line a purse, his heart bleeds, play her part, play the truant, thrust his nose out of joynte (disappoint him), p. 81, a woman flies out (in rage), come to an anker, money goes a greate waie, take the benefit of, know not what to make of it. The new overhale appears twice, meaning vincere; our overhaul is rather different; see pp. 3 and 203. A visitor calls in, p. 12; the first hint of morning calls. A man lays unto a woman (presses her), p. 56; hence our later lay into him. A navigator takes the height (altitude) of the sun, p. 72. Clocks were now set, as we see by clocke setter, p. 79. The strange verb lumpe is used as a synonym for lour and frown, p. 221; hence Mrs. Pipchin's phrase "she may lump it" (sulk over it). The Infinitive, expressing surprise, is now placed first in the sentence; to thinke that I should crave! p. 64. The Celtic peate (pet) appears once more, applied ironically to a woman, in pp. 63 and 172; Scott's countrymen apply the word to a man, as when Ratcliffe recognises Sir George Staunton in the Tolbooth.

Among the Romance phrases are commit to memory, repose trust in, a good round sum, p. 115, carnation. Some fashions are said to be a la mode de Fraunce; the first words were to be made an English phrase seventy years later. There is the old gentle (noble), p. 35, and the new gentill (courteous), p. 34; this latter form had been early known in England, had died out, and was now once more brought over from France. There is the French feat, which is also represented by the Latin fact (achievement), p. 48. The word sot here bears its old meaning stultus, p. 49, though elsewhere it was now taking the sense of ebrius. The verb stay means "make his abode," p. 52, a new shade of meaning. A man wears a lady's colours, p. 139. In the same page stands more nice than wise, an idiom most unlike the Greek; the nice here means elegant; Cowper used it as fastidious when he employed the proverb. A fashion was coming in of compounding new verbs with fy; netify (make neat) stands in p. 142. A man, imitating his wife, is said to run mad for companie, p. 155, a new phrase. The word profession, which had lately taken a new sense, is applied to the trade of harlots, p. 159. The word companion is employed in scorn for fellow, p. 172, a Shakesperian usage. The word coyme is used for pecunia, p. 196, as in modern slang. The Italian seraglio expresses the Turk's harem, p. 118.

Stubbes brought out his 'Anatomy of the Abuses in England' in 1583 (New Shakespere Society). In workeday, p. 49, he restores the Southern e, which in some parts of England had been lost; hence the later workaday world. The u replaces a; Skelton's bas (osculum) becomes buss, p. 165. The l is inserted; Palsgrave's verb hug becomes huggle, p. 97, with the new meaning amplecti. The old quavemire becomes quagmire, p. 115. The z replaces s, as pezant (agrestis), p. 40. There are the new Substantives eye witness, gingerlyness, gaming howse, huf-cap (ale). Rioters are called wilde-heds, p. 147, like the later hot-heads. The word brand gets the new sense of signum, p. 142, and was to give birth to a new verb. The word pussie is now used of a woman, p. 97. In p. 190 we see to the last gaspe, and also another form, to the last cast. Stubbes makes wakesses the Plural of wake, p. 152, which reminds us of the later beastesses. Among the Adjectives is hellish; a bark at sea may be crasie, p. 51. There is the phrase and which is more, p. xi., when facts are to be emphasised; here we put what for which. Among the Verbs are strike terror into, the day hath bene when, etc., set pen to paper, men are put in trust. The affirmation I dare be bound follows a sentence in p. 53; here we substitute will for dare. Men are mizzeled with wine, p. 87 (drawn into a mist); hence the later muzzy. In p. xi. stands upon the other side (hand), to express contra. The of is used in a new and strange way in p. 70; unheard of pride; here the of does not govern the following noun. This word of was now coming in after verbs of tolerance; you allowe of it, p. 153. Something is done in a cloud, p. 186; here we substitute under.

Among the Romance words are exploit, to innoble, intricate, proclivity, to button, Martialist, devilrie, squash, slash, maxim, ingenious, to pat, to plume, to inaugur, p. 75, condign, iterate, temporizer, hobby horse, caper, subscribe to (assent), remise (remiss). We see, moreover, the Greek catalogue, basis, agonized, myriad. There is the phrase a reasonable large shurte, p. 61, where the adjective stands for an adverb. Women are called that gentle sex, p. 63; they wear bugles as an ornament, p. 67. There is the curious adjective direfull, p. 70, where the Teutonic ending is not wanted. In p. 98 miscreant is used, no longer for a misbeliever, but for a wicked man. Lyly's new sense of ebrius comes into the verb assot, p. 110. The word schole begins to extend its meaning; sholes of dauncing were set up about this time, p. 154. Music is used in publique assemblies, p. 170; here the last word, which was to be very popular about 1700, becomes social in its meaning. A rich man is maistered (called master) at every word, p. 122. A cruel man is called a tyger, p. 127. In one and the same page, 158, nicenes expresses lascivia, nicitie expresses elegantia. There is the phrase the Pope of Roome, p. 161; chorus, in the same page, makes its Plural chorusses. The verb range is made transitive; range the cuntrey, p. 171.

England was evidently increasing in wealth in 1583; Stubbes complains that men, base by birth and mean by estate, dress as gorgeously as their betters, p. 34. In his father's time a dish or two of good meat had been thought ample for the dinner of a man of great worship; the old generation ate little but cold meats, hard to digest, p. 103. Prices had risen fivefold within the last twenty years, p. 119. Every tinker and swineherd now expected to enjoy the prefix of master, p. 122. Stubbes protests against wakes and dancing, refuting the Scriptural arguments sometimes brought forward in favour of the latter practice; women ought to dance with women, men with men, p. 161. Some, horrible to relate, choose their wives by dancing, p. 163; a practice not yet extinct in England. He allows cards and dice in moderation, "after some oppression of studie," p. 174. Like Tyndale, he protested against cruelty to animals ; even the poor bear ought not to be abused ; love God, love His creatures, p. 178. Hunting is not altogether condemned ; but some give their whole lives to it ; it is too bad to break down hedges and trample corn, p. 182. Football is a bloody and murdering practice ; a long list of fractures, commonly resulting from the game, is given, p. 184. Early marriages seem to have been usual ; Stubbes married his wife when she was fifteen, p. 197.

In Part ii. of the 'Anatomy' the a replaces e, for lather appears, from the old leprian (ungere), p. 50. The word income bears the sense of "entrance fee," p. 29. There is the new word starre gaiser ; in the last word the old a was getting the sound of ai. We see the adjective hollowe harted, p. 7. There is a new use of that in p. 81 ; it stands before a Plural verb, something like so ; are there no laws? yes, that there are. The old verb blend had lingered only in the North ; it is revived by Stubbes, p. 25, when he talks of the adulteration of wines. We see the noun penall lawes, and the verb to liquor (moisten), p. 37 ; its American meaning is rather different. The word musty loses its old sense of moist, is confused with the French moisi (mouldy), and gets its Shakesperian sense in p. 47. Certain divines gallop the service over, p. 74. The foreign suffix appears in Brownist, p. 74. Stubbes was the first Englishman, I think, who spent much ink in attacking the follies of Astrology, p. 66 ; his work was carried on in after years by Ben Jonson and Congreve.

Fulke brought out his 'Defence of the English translation of the Bible' in 1583 (Parker Society) ; this was written against Martin, a Roman Catholic. Among the new Substantives are book-writer, headship, co-worker, a jump. In p. 198 John at Nokes is used for any person. The phrase "it is a hell to live thus" is given as an English metaphor, p. 318. We read of men's sayings and doings, p. 450. A man who cannot see well is told that his eyes are not matches, p. 452 ; a new phrase. There is the new Adjective watery ; flat is used in a new sense ; flat Pharisaism, a flat lie ; we hear of a broad difference, p. 403, where the old sense manifestus comes in. Something is better English, when translation is in question, p. 470. There is the phrase a whole hundred of examples, p. 304, where the Numeral is made a noun. Among the Verbs we see beg the principle (question), call in books; a man never feels almsgiving (is the worse for it), p. 447. There is the curious Perfect he molted (melted), p. 213, a compounding of the Strong and the Weak. As to Prepositions, Jews are reverend, even to superstition, p. 590; here some such participle as reaching must be understood before the preposition. Certain friars are at daggers drawing, as we say, p. 35. The word so expresses in that case, p. 575; "we must not use Scripture in a certain way, so shall the Jews laugh us to scorn."

Among the Romance words are linguist, extenuate, elegancy, complement (filling up), putative, servile, propriety, improper, circumlocution, traduce, mixture, discredit. Something is done after a sort (a kind of way), p. 436; a great ellipse. The word Hebrician, like the old Grecian, is coined to express a certain department of scholarship, p. 122. We hear of a forced translation, no question (doubt) but, etc., a fault is gross, a professed enemy, proper names, as plain as he can speak. The new form purity appears in p. 476; Tyndale's pureness has twice been altered into this purity by the later Revisers. There is the Greek iota, solecism, typical, obelisk, asterisk, etymologist; our ellipse appears as eclipsis, p. 159; much Greek is quoted in the book. The noun rule takes the new sense of imperium, p. 487; "establish the Pope's rule;" this is the old regiment and the later régime of our newspapers. A shelf over a fireplace projects like a hood or mantle; hence, in p. 208, Fulke talks of the mantel-tree of a chimney; and hence the later mantle piece. He brackets vulgar and popular speech, answering to our "common parlance," p. 255. The word delicate expresses fastidious, p. 256; it has run a course parallel to nice. The word profane is applied by Martin to Protestant translators of the Bible, pp. 464 and 483; he means that they degrade holy things in base fashion; hitherto the word had borne a harmless sense. The word context, p. 561, begins to replace the old circumstance, which is also found in this work, expressing the same idea. A certain translation is called dissolute, p. 386, our free or loose. In the same page famous takes the new sense of ingens; "the famous place of Augustine is a famous corruption of papists;" Shakespere has something like this. The verb disgrace takes the new meaning of degrade or lower, p. 452; we now usually apply the verb to men, not to things, as here. Martin declares that the very name of ministers is odious, because they are so wicked and unlearned, p. 198; and this Fulke partly admits. The Lutherans are called our pue-fellows, p. 204. Fulke says that the word schisms would not be understood in England; divisions, or some such word, must be used, p. 219. He derives the Northern word kyrke from the Greek, p. 231. Martin is scornfully called "prince of the Critici," p. 381; critic was not yet naturalised. Fulke says that carcase is a word of scorn, p. 83, that confide is a French phrase, not equal to be of good comfort, p. 90; the Papal party had rather speak French than English, talking of ancients and sages, not of elders and wise men, p. 90, of chief, not of head, p. 112. He is hard on the French-English terms of his enemy, p. 250. There are the well-known wrangles over priest (presbyter), p. 109, gratia plena, p. 149, repentance, p. 155. The word image is understood by all Englishmen; not so the word idol, p. 179; the latter is always taken in an evil sense, pp. 181 and 196. The common folk understood shrift much better than confession, p. 458; acknowledge is more usual in English than confess, p. 459. Martin objects to yokefellow, p. 475, declaring that it implied marriage; he asks why the word adoration is shunned, p. 542. He calls ballad a very profane term, to translate canticum canticorum, p. 571. He complains of the abusive term massing priests, p. 276; he declares that there is a difference between just and righteous; this Fulke denies, p. 337, though he allows that the latter is the more familiar English word. Martin says that historical or special are heretical terms newly devised and applied to faith, p. 423. Fulke, who cannot have read Wickliffe, declares that the Romish term evangelize (preach) is a new word, not understood of mere English ears, p. 549. His strong point, to which he often returns, is the number of Latin words wantonly brought into the Romish Testament ; “ your affected novelties of terms, such as neither English nor Christian ears ever heard in the English tongue ; scandal, prepuce, neophyte, depositum, gratis, parasceve, paraclete, exinanite, repropitiate, and a hundred such like inkhorn terms.” Why not talk of gazophilace and the encenes ? “ These, and such other, be wonders of words, that wise men can give no good reason why they should be used.”

It was a happy thing that England stuck to her own version of the Bible, and would have none of the Douai article. Fancy such words as exinanite and repropitiate being read out in our parish churches !

“ Di meliora piis erroremque hostibus illum ! ”

There is a piece of Queen Elizabeth’s time, ‘Reliquiæ Antiquæ,’ i. 249 ; here a man swears by Jis that his wife thinkes to were the goodman’s bretche. In ii. 122 we hear of a lyther lad scampant, the source of our noun scamp, coming from the French s’escamper (fugere), or perhaps from the Italian scampare.

In Collier’s ‘Dramatic Poetry,’ vol. ii. p. 198, we see strike a pegge (blow) into him with a club ; hence our “ to peg at him.”

About 1585 Puttenham was writing his ‘Art of English Poesy’ (Arber’s Reprint), which was published, without the author’s name, in 1589. Two forms of one Old English word may be seen in one sentence, p. 215, to till it is a toyle. Tyndale had written of the main sea ; this is now shortened into mayne, p. 219 ; flouds of eloquence is mentioned as an admissible phrase, p. 263. Charles V. spoke of the English Channel as the broad ditch, p. 277. The noun tug had been formed from the verb ; in that day it meant harness, in our time a steamer ; see p. 281. The Plural loves stands for the French amours, p. 276. There is the Vocative fair one, p. 245, the old Yorkshire phrase of which Shakespere is so fond. We hear of a girl’s young man in p. 66. Ladies scamble after nuts, p. 66 ; Foxe had already inserted the r in this word. The phrase take to task seems to be used for vincere in p. 253 ; it refers to contests in wrestling. A father keeps in play his children, p. 286, by riding a hobby horse. Men speak corectedly ; here an Adverb is built upon the Past Participle, p. 263. There is the short no doubt of that, p. 201. A person is commanded away (ordered off), p. 277. In the freelier and cleerer, p. 306, we see first the old and then the new form of the Adverb.

There is the Celtic cokes (coax), p. 36.

Among the Romance words are buffon, buffonry, a pyramis, pedestall, to retranch, fatallitie, stuffed (figure), browne paper, to inforce, to renforce, pleasantery, proseman (speaker in prose, p. 202), imprecation, affected, recapitulation, sententious, remorse, granditie (grandeur), things of consequence, turn tayle, change his countenance. We see dilemma, p. 230. The epithet delicate may now be applied either to a poet or an ear, pp. 33 and 94. The word close now means finis, p. 225. The adjective brave takes the sense of fortis, p. 228. The word impertinent may bear the sense of frivolus ; vain and impertinent speeches are coupled in p. 272, implying sharp retorts ; these a man delivers from him (self) ; a new meaning of the verb. Something may be undecent, also indecent, p. 283 ; decencie in p. 269 is said to be a scholastical term for our own Saxon English seemelynesse and comelynesse. In p. 287 Alexander fights liberally (like a gentleman) ; the Teutonic free might mean the same. The word surlly bears its oldest sense, lordly, in p. 299 ; a man should be solemn and surlly with his equals. The old portraiture is cut down to pourtrayt, p. 110. Queen Elizabeth is said to be sans peere, p. 112 ; the sans that Shakespere loved. Our author prefers Maior domo to the French and English equivalents, p. 158 ; he dislikes audacious, egregious, and compatible. He says that pelf is too low a word to be applied to a Prince's treasures ; he affirms that it means the shreds of tailors and skinners. In p. 277 Germany appears as "the Empire." The headgear of the Moslem is called a tolibant, p. 291 (Turkish tulbend) ; this was soon to be altered into turban ; there is also Sultan.

Puttenham's work shows the growing interest in the history of English Literature, which he declares (how unlike Borde!) to be equal to the French or Italian, p. 73; he traces it from Chaucer to Sidney, declaring that Queen Elizabeth surmounts all other poets! Some of her lines, rather Alliterative, are given in p. 255. He protests against the Latin words that had supplanted their French offspring, as innumerable for innombrable, p. 130. Standard English is said to be that spoken within sixty miles of London; "herein we are ruled by the English dictionaries;" although what is spoken to the North of Trent is "the purer English Saxon," p. 157. He is always protesting against fine language, and against French words like roy (king) or egar (wander) being thrust into English verse for the sake of a rime. He discusses the use of pauses, comma, colon, periode, p. 89. He treats of the stanza, Alexandrine, circumflex, anagram, enigma, onomatopœia (sic), sarcasmus, periphrasis, clymax, pleonasmus, analogie, barbarisme. He remarks that the Dutch and French cannot sound the English th, p. 257. It is affirmed that English ambassadors stand alone in speaking foreign languages when at foreign Courts, whence odd mistakes sometimes arise, p. 277. The English and Germans shake hands; the French, Spaniards, and Italians embrace over the shoulder, or under the arms, or at the very knees, p. 292. Puttenham insists much upon decency; he prints etc. (et cetera) for a certain broad word used by a French Princess, p. 274; he avoids printing some uncleanly English rimes, p. 275. In p. 290 he prints a word from which we now shrink, but he will not print a certain other word much of the same kind, using a periphrasis; all this is in one sentence.

Before closing this Chapter, it is well to revert once more to the greatest English masterpiece of the Century. It is well known that those who revised the English Bible in 1611 were bidden to keep as near as they could to the old versions, such as Tyndale's: this behest is one of the few good things that we owe to our Northern Solomon, the great inventor of kingcraft. The diction of the Bible seemed most archaic in the mouths of the Puritans in 1642, as their foes tell us; this could hardly have been the case had the version been a work of Bacon's time. The Book's influence upon all English-speaking men has been most astounding; the Koran alone can boast an equal share of reverence, spread far and wide. Of the English Bible's 6000 words, only 250 are not in common use now; and almost all of these last are readily understood.¹ Every good English writer has drawn freely upon the great Version; we know the skill with which Lord Macaulay and others interweave its homely, pithy diction with their prose. Even men who have left the English Church acknowledge that Rome herself cannot conjure away the old spell laid upon their minds by Tyndale's Bible. This book it is that affords the first lessons lisped by the English child at its mother's knee; this book it is that prompts the last words faltered by the English graybeard on his deathbed. In this book we have found our strongest breakwater against the tides of silly novelties, ever threatening to swamp our speech. Tyndale stands in a far nearer relation to us than Dante stands in to the Italians.

English literature is so closely intertwined with English history and English religion that we are driven to ask, what would have been the future of our tongue, had the Reformation, the great event of this Sixteenth Century, been trampled down in our island? Our national character is nearer akin to that of Spain than to that of France; I fear, therefore, that had Rome won the day in England, our religion would have smacked more of Philip II. than of Cardinal Richelieu, more of grim bloody Ultramontaniam than of the other and milder form of Romanism. We know how Cervantes felt himself shackled by the awful, overbearing Inquisition; English writers would have fared no better, but would have dragged on their lives in everlasting fear of spies, gaolers, racks, and stakes. Could Shakespere have breathed in such an air? Hardly so. Could Milton? Most assuredly not. Our mother tongue, thought unworthy to become the handmaid of religion, would have sunk (exinanited) into a Romance jargon, with few Teutonic words in it but pronouns, conjunctions, and such like.

Many Orders of the Roman Church have brought their influence to bear upon our speech. In the Seventh Century, the Benedictines gave us our first batch of Latin ware, the technical words employed by Western Christianity.¹ In the Thirteenth Century, the Franciscans, as I think, wrought great havock among our old words, and brought into vogue hundreds of French terms. In the Sixteenth Century, the Jesuits and their friends strove hard to set up a religious machinery of their own among us; happy was it for England that she turned away from their merchandise, so hated of old Fulke. These luckless followers of the Pope, as time wore on, found their English style as much disliked as their politics or their creed; glad were they in the days of James II. when so great a master as Dryden came to their help in controversy.² Such evil words as probabilism and infallibilist were never to become common in English mouths.

The Reformation, among its other blessings, bound together those old foes England and Scotland by ties undreamt of in the days of Wolsey; it wrought a further change in the North country's speech. Tyndale's great work was smuggled from abroad into Scotland, as well as into England. A Scotch heretic on his trial in 1539, referred to his Testament, which he kept ready at hand; the accuser shouted, "Behold, Sirs, he has the book of heresy in his sleeve, that makes all the din and play in our Kirk!"³ Tyndale, as I before showed, wrought for the good of England in more ways than one. John Knox was soundly rated by the other side for Anglicising, not only in religion and politics, but also in his speech. Soon after 1600, Aytoun and Drummond wrote in the London dialect ; Scotland, as she would have said herself, had to "dree her weird." The false Southron was fast getting the upper hand by a new kind of warfare ; the Lowland peasantry, among whom schools began to thrive, read the truths of religion enshrined in a dialect that would have jarred on the ears of John Bellenden or Gawain Douglas. To this day the Scotch minister in his sermons keeps as near as he can to the speech of Westminster and Oxford ; though his flock, when in the field or at the hearth, cleave fast to their good old Northern tongue.¹

² "Hout, Monkbarns, dinna set your wit against a bairn!" says Edie Ochiltree. This sentence might be applied to Stillingfleet, when we consider the men pitted against him. Dryden says that it was the great Anglican divines who taught him how to write English.

Thus the New Standard English, convoyed by the Reformation, made its way to the far North, and also into the Protestant settlements in Ireland ; it soon afterwards crossed the Atlantic in the Pilgrim Fathers' ship. Tyndale's great work, beloved by all forms alike of English Protestantism, will for ever be a bond of fellowship between the ninety millions of the Angel cyn, whether they live on the Thames, the Potomac, the Kuruman, or the Murrumbidgee. Our tongue is like the Turk, who will bear no brothers near his throne ; Irish and Welsh are dying out, as Cornish did long ago.

The great prose writers of the Sixteenth Century did much for the cause of sound English. Cheke, though writing some years after Tyndale's death, had a hankering after Fifteenth Century words, and strove to keep alive againrising and againbirth. His pupil Ascham made head against the foreign rubbish, which "did make all thinges darke and hard." Wilson in 1550 branded the "strange ynkehorne terms" of his day. One part of his criticism may be most earnestly recommended to the fine writers of our own time. "Some seke so farre for outlandishe Englishe, that thei forgette altogether their mothers' language. . . . He that commeth lately out of France, will talke Frenche-English, and never blush at the matter. The unlearned or foolishe phantasticall that smelles but of learnyng will so Latin their toungues that the simple cannot but wonder at their talke and thinke surely thei speake by some revelacion. I know them that thinke Rhetorique to stand whollie upon darke woordes, and he that can catche an ynke horne terme by the taile, hym thei coumpt to be a fine Englishman and a good Rhetorician." In spite of all these drawbacks, Mulcaster wrote thus in 1583: "The English tung cannot prove fairer than it is at this day." He was a rash soothsayer, and little knew what was to be the literary history of the next thirty years. A new period was to begin.

THE OLD AND MIDDLE ENGLISH. A New Edition,
Revised and Enlarged, of The Sources of Standard English.
Globe 8vo. 9s.

"That such a book can now be written in such a shape, is a sign of the vast steps which have been made within the last few years, by clear and scientific views of history and philosophy. It comes nearer to a History of the English Language than anything that we have seen since such a history could be written without confusion and contradictions. Mr. Oliphant firmly grasps the truth, that English is English, and always has been English, and not anything else. In clearness and precision he is a century or two in advance of Mr. Marsh and writers of that date. He shows all along that he has been working his philology, as alone it can be safely worked, under the wing of history."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Oliphant has produced a most useful and opportune book. He has traced, in an interesting and popular way, the changes of letters, inflections, forms, and words during the whole course of our language. It is neither too technical nor too long to prevent the general reader understanding and enjoying the book, while he gets sound information from it."—Athenæum.

"The volume before us has all the force and flow of original composition, all the freedom of an independent thinker, and is yet remarkable for fidelity to detail and historical precision in recording the facts of transition in our language."—John Bull.

"This book is in reality one of the most interesting works on the History of the Language which has yet been written for the use of the student. It is a book which should be read by all students of the good old tongue; a book which would help to form the taste of all intelligent readers."—Educational Times.

"An exceedingly able book, containing clear views clearly expressed. It is just such a work as general readers have for several years been feeling the want of. Ample materials lay ready for the work, and they could not have found a better exponent than Mr. Oliphant. He has produced by far the best history of our language yet written. It is a model of well-digested scholarship."—The Examiner.

"In a popular but yet scholarlike way, Mr. Oliphant has traced the gradual change of our language from Anglo-Saxon into modern English; and has given an amusing account of Good and Bad English in 1873."—Report of the Early English Text Society for 1874.

"Mr. Oliphant has done good service in bringing together, and making easily accessible, much of this hitherto rare learning. Ten years ago not a page of this book could have been written."—The Nation (New York).

"To read the sixth chapter is as healthful an exercise as to walk thirty miles as the crow flies. It is from first to last a most exciting raid against Dr. Johnson run mad. Mr. Oliphant has managed to put together a rare variety of monstrosities, slang, bombast, twaddle, and general absurdity, all illustrative of the style of speech and writing of this age. There is, withal, a series of spicy anecdotes arranged as illustrative footnotes. These form as entertaining reading in their way as Dean Ramsay or Hislop. Taken, however, along with the text, they are specially effective."—Dumbarton Herald.

"Mr. Oliphant has wrought out a good idea in a very able way. He is mercilessly severe on modern writers of gaudy English, and certain preachers, to whom he devotes a scarifying chapter."—British Quarterly Review.
